> "It is my view with certainty that the entire thing will fall apart if decommissioning does not take place. Whatever happens after that, that is another thing."

I do not think that he could have been clearer. I think that his support and his commitment to the implementation of the Good Friday agreement as a whole are necessary and welcome. He should be applauded for the strength of that commitment.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Those of us who had the privilege of participating in the negotiations in Castle Buildings in April 1998 always knew that the agreement was reached without trust. Does the Secretary of State agree that trust has begun to creep in, and that one of its bases is the excellent relationship between the British and Irish Governments? Will he assure the House that, whatever happens during the next week, we will not go back to bad relations between our two Governments, and that the excellent relationship that has been established will be built on in the future? Will he also assure the House that the agreement is the property not of the eight parties that signed it, or of the two Governments, but of the people of Ireland—in the north and the Irish Republic—who voted for it overwhelmingly? Will he confirm that the agreement will not be torn up, as some rejectionists want, but will continue in some form in the future?

Mr. Mandelson: There is absolutely no question of the Good Friday agreement being torn up. It will encounter many vicissitudes; it will encounter difficult times and, no doubt, strong opposition from familiar quarters. However, in my view, it is strong enough—robust enough—to withstand all that, because it is the right agreement for the people of Northern Ireland, as well as for those in the Republic. The agreement simply could not have been achieved without the efforts, put in over so long a time, by people in political parties in north and south and by the Governments both here and in the south. It is absolutely important that those relations are built upon, and they will be, so that that trust, which my hon. Friend rightly says has crept in, is kept in and built on in the future.

Mr. Jeffrey Donaldson (Lagan Valley): Will the Secretary of State now confirm exactly when we can expect to receive the de Chastelain report? Secondly, if decommissioning has not been completed by 22 May 2000, will the Secretary of State confirm that, under the terms of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998, he is under a statutory obligation to halt the early release of terrorist prisoners, which is not due to be completed until July 2000; that between 22 May and the end of July, there is a considerable number—perhaps somewhere in the region of 150—of terrorist prisoners remaining to be released; and that it would be most unfair if those releases were to continue in the absence of the decommissioning of terrorist weapons?

Mr. Mandelson: On the specific point of the prisoner releases, the provisions relating to those flow from legislation that was foreshadowed in the Good Friday agreement. Prisoner releases had always depended not on the state of decommissioning, but on the state of the ceasefires. That remains the case. The maintenance of the ceasefires obviously remains under permanent scrutiny by the Government. We will not be suspending the Good Friday agreement; therefore, we are not going to put into reverse all those gains and all those changes that have flowed from its implementation. We will be suspending, if we need to—and only if we need to as a last resort—the operation of the political institutions, for what I hope will be a very short period of time.

As for the report issued by General de Chastelain, I have described fully and accurately—and certainly somewhat disappointingly—the contents. I can give the hon. Gentleman this assurance: it will not be changed prior to publication and it will be published alongside any further report, should one be issued.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): In agreeing wholeheartedly with the tone and the content of my right hon. Friend's statement, may I ask him whether he thinks that the key to progress is to try to get some clarification of the relationship between Sinn Fein and the IRA? There seems to be a variable distance between them. When there is a ceasefire, Sinn Fein claims that it is close to the IRA and, hence, that it deserves the credit for the ceasefire. When there is a failure to decommission, there is a huge gap between them and Sinn Fein claims, as it did to us yesterday in Belfast, that it is nothing, or very little, to do with it. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if there is a huge difference between Sinn Fein and the IRA on the matter, the undertakings that Sinn Fein gave in the Belfast agreement were not given in good faith because it did not have the necessary relationship to give those undertakings?

Mr. Mandelson: No, I do not think that it would be fair to say that any commitments made in relation to the Good Friday agreement were made in bad faith. I genuinely do not believe that. I think that there was a sincere commitment made by individuals to do their best to bring about the changes to persuade their colleagues in other parts of the republican movement to fulfil the Good Friday agreement in the way that they had signed up to. They do not appear to have been entirely successful, however. Rather than spending time clarifying the relationship between Sinn Fein and the IRA, I would just urge them to agree on what needs to be done and to get on and do it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Only five Members are waiting to be called. I am conscious that the Secretary of State has been at the Dispatch Box for more than an hour, and it is not usual to keep a Secretary of State at the Dispatch Box for even an hour. All parts of the statement have been well aired, so can I have brisk questions and brisk answers from the Secretary of State? I do not wish to disappoint hon. Members on such an important issue.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): The Secretary of State appears to be saying that he will not publish independently, in advance of any second report that there may be, the de Chastelain report on which he based his statement. Why is that?

Mr. Mandelson: I have already described accurately and fully the contents of the report. If I felt it were important and relevant for the House to see and to compare one report with another in the event of a further report being issued, I shall make sure that the original one is published alongside it.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Will the Secretary of State take the opportunity, when he speaks to Sinn Fein, to point out to it that the two-year time frame was largely for the benefit of those who needed to have trust built? If they are not taking advantage of that to take staged decommissioning when the opportunity exists as they go along to have the reassurances that they may need, they are losing the benefits of the agreement to which they themselves signed up.

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman—perhaps inadvertently—puts his finger on a thorny issue. The problem for members of Sinn Fein as they would present it, if they had taken up their seats here and were to respond to him directly, is that, whereas the Good Friday agreement was signed 18 months and more ago, the Executive and the institutions came into effect only last December. Therefore, they think that the time frame has become somewhat concertina-ed. It is a matter for them to make the case on their own behalf—I am certainly not going to do so for them—but it is not unreasonable to take that into account even though it does not provide an excuse for the inaction that we have seen.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): When is an understanding and an agreement not an understanding and an agreement, and when are procrastination and good faith not procrastination and good faith? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it appears to be when we are talking about decommissioning? Does he accept that there can be no lasting, certain peace in Northern Ireland without the decommissioning of the huge arsenal of terrorist weapons? Will he now lay down a firm timetable for such decommissioning? We have been talking about it for three years.

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the nature of my responsibilities and those of General de Chastelain and his colleagues on the decommissioning body. It is their job, not mine, to do what he has described, and they are trying their best to achieve it.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Will the Secretary of State give the reasons for the Disqualifications Bill? Will he deny that it was based on a secret agreement with Sinn Fein-IRA?

Mr. Mandelson: The reasons for the Disqualifications Bill remain the same as described by my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary, and no, they were not the subject of any deal made with any organisation.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I am most grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for your forbearance on this occasion.

In order that the people of Northern Ireland and the Members of the House can make a complete, fair and balanced judgment, will the Secretary of State undertake to publish the de Chastelain report before the House rises tomorrow afternoon?

Mr. Mandelson: I have nothing to add to the answers that I have already given on four occasions during the course of the statement.

Thames Gateway

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

8.21 pm

Mrs. Christine Butler (Castle Point): Previously called the East Thames corridor, the Thames gateway begins in east London, and extends from Stratford and Greenwich to Tilbury in Essex and Sittingbourne and Sheerness in Kent.

Tonight, I shall argue that the Thames gateway should be further extended to include areas north of the river, just as at present it includes areas along the Kent coast to the south. That view is supported by the Essex chamber of commerce, and it is a major plank of the south-east Essex economic strategy document. Essex county council and the Essex economic partnership are strong supporters of that proposal, as is the East of England development agency, and the south-east regional planning committee, which is better known as Serplan.

The panel report following the public examination of the regional planning guidance for the south-east was a huge disappointment not only for its suggestion that the south-east should have 1 million more dwellings, but for its recommendation that the Thames gateway should not be further extended into Essex.

In December, Castle Point council informed the Government office for the east of England that the panel report did not reflect an adequate understanding of the economic problems of south-east Essex, and that further consideration should be given to those matters in a review of the Thames gateway planning guidance.

The council also expressed its concerns about the unco-ordinated approach to the transport infrastructure generally and the lack of attention to the problem of south Essex in particular. It went on to say that the panel report did not reflect a sustainable approach to the development of the region, and was likely to result in increased pressure on existing resources.

The south-east regional planning statement justified the extension of the gateway. South Essex has direct links to London and the existing gateway, with major industrial and service agencies linked to those of London. While it traditionally provides a large part of London's work force, a more sustainable strategy needs to be developed.

The north Thames area provides the nearest resort, tourism and leisure facilities outside London for the local Essex and visiting London population. It has direct transport links by road and rail to the existing gateway and London. They also link to the M25 and London Southend airport. The LTS rail route forms part of the trans-European network, and that reflects the area's appeal as the gateway to the continent. That is further supported by port facilities. The area also has pockets of deprivation that compare to those in the existing gateway south of the Thames.

Inclusion in the gateway would bring opportunities for sustainable economic development by reducing traffic demand on major routes into, and out of, London. It would reduce competition for jobs in London and the existing gateway. It could provide local people with better accessibility to local jobs, improve transport links by air, rail and water, and increase the range of economic development, including port and river facilities.

[Mrs. Christine Butler]

That sets in context the plea that I make for Castle Point and, in particular, Canvey Island. For the life of me, I never understood why Canvey Island was ignored when the Thames gateway regeneration project first emerged. After all, it is an island strategically placed in the gateway to London, surrounded by the Thames and within the Port of London authority.

Almost 2,000 years ago, in the first century, the Romans spotted its advantages, as did the Viking invaders about 800 years later. The Vikings were defeated in 893 by King Alfred's army in the battle of Benfleet. When the Dutch settled on Canvey, they turned what had been rather a deserted place into farmland and established a small but thriving community. They drained the land, built a church and set about defending the island from the power of the sea.

Successive settlers did not change the essentially rural landscape that much until the 20th century. During the industrial revolution, Canvey escaped unscathed. No Dickensian horrors of urban living can be traced on Canvey, although visitors will find a plaque on the wall of the Lobster Smack noting that this remote spot was the inspiration for scenes from "Great Expectations". Even when the railways came and a new station was built at Benfleet, visitors from London seeking the joys of Canvey would have to cross Benfleet creek by the stepping stones.

Today, Canvey Island is a very different place. The strong sea defences established after the 1953 floods and the added security that they brought began to draw a much greater interest in the place from developers. Housebuilding started to accelerate. However, those intent on making a good profit from real estate were not the only ones to have their eye on the commercial potential of Canvey Island. This interest may have come late to Canvey but, when it did, it was rapid and merciless to the growing community of islanders, and Canvey was not prepared.

Canvey again was seen to occupy a strategic location on the Thames. It was recognised as a good place to store oil, a good place for an oil refinery and an ideal location to import all sorts of high-bulk commodities, from coal to crushed rock, to feed the rapacious jaws of London and its hinterland. The competing interests between a rapidly rising population and new industrial development was never properly resolved. There was no comprehensive plan to care for Canvey and Canvey suffered.

How could a small island be expected to cope with all those competing pressures? Well, it could not. Thank goodness Essex county council stepped in during the early 1990s to back islanders against the plans of Peter de Savory to build a massive 4,500 more houses on the last remaining expanse of ancient grazing land on the western part of Canvey.

My involvement with the island began at the time of the public inquiry into the proposal and, despite all the lobbying that was going on at the time by various politicians, the Secretary of State made the right decision and refused the application. However, Canvey's future was still uncertain. Development, taking no account of the needs of the population or a long-term, sustainable future for Canvey, still remains a threat.

Very soon, the planning committee will have to consider an application for the storage and auction of accident-damaged cars on a 30-acre site at the bottom of Haven road. That is a big area. Many of the cars will become scrap. The application comes from HBC, which trades from Charfleets industrial estate. Should the project go ahead, the result could be an expansion of a land use that is prejudicial to the best interests of the island. Canvey does not need more scrap cars on this scale. The scheme will offer virtually no employment. Instead, it will worsen traffic conditions, in particular making the lives of the people living in and around Haven road a misery. It will create an enormous ugly scar on the flat landscape of Canvey. Who would want to be near that?

Canvey needs to attract the kind of things that its people need and want, such as good, clean jobs, better amenity and improved road access. I firmly believe that Canvey is not big enough to accommodate dirty, untidy industry and almost 40,000 people. We need to implement a new 21st century vision for Canvey, putting the blight of the last half of the 20th century in the history books.

Part of this speech, which outlines my apprehension for the future of Canvey, was printed in one of our local newspapers recently, and it seems to have touched a raw nerve on the part of one Terry Holding, principal director of HBC Group. He responded in a disgraceful and shameful manner.

Yesterday, my office received several telephone calls from concerned constituents who had been the unfortunate recipients of a malicious and defamatory letter about their Member of Parliament, written by that man. He is the same person who was rejected at the ballot box when he stood as a Conservative candidate in the local elections less than a year ago. I cannot allow myself to be intimidated by such an approach, and nor could any Member of Parliament. I will continue to represent the interests of Castle Point and my constituents.

With reference to Mr. Holding's allegations, and to set the record straight, I have never said that I had secured a company to build and run a marina at Holehaven on Canvey, but I have pushed the idea that a marina could be the key to unlocking the problems that we are experiencing in attracting the right kind of investment on development land around Safeway.

Properly and sympathetically designed, that could help to regenerate the land on which the former Occidental oil refinery once stood. It could attract projects for environmental regeneration, protected open space, conservation and amenity, promoting the attractiveness of the area. Plans for a high-quality business park would therefore be far more likely to go ahead.

It is of paramount importance that a better image—as well as reality—should be created for Canvey. For the land south of Northwick road, that will require a great deal of hard work, commitment and imagination. We must be brave enough to challenge old expectations and welcome new thinking. We must believe that, in the end, our aspirations can be realised. We can overcome the legacy of past carelessness, but we need help.

Castle Point is one of the riparian authorities included in the new Thames Estuary partnership. The partnership is a neutral body set up to promote integrated policies for the whole of the Thames estuary. It is looking at matters such as improving air quality, enhancing bio-diversity, sustainable commercial use, managing fisheries, flood defences, cultural resources, landscape character, and waste and water management. It aims to act as a catalyst to co-ordinate sustainable activities through London to the lower reaches of the Thames.

I have just read the partnership's strategy document, "Today's Estuary Tomorrow" and I applaud the way in which it has been drawn up. It gives a significant lead to the way in which we should be thinking about the Thames estuary. It would be an anomaly if the Thames gateway planning guidance did not extend to all the Thames estuary authorities, including the north side of the Thames. And it would be a great shame if, to steal a phrase, Canvey Island were left out and forgotten.

8.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Beverley Hughes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Mrs. Butler) on securing the debate. I welcome the opportunity to reassure her of the Government's desire to encourage new economic development and investment in Canvey Island and the whole of south-east Essex, and to reiterate our commitment to regional planning.

I am aware that, in recent years, south-east Essex may not have prospered to the same extent as some other parts of the south-east region. The area has much to recommend it, as my hon. Friend made clear. It is rich in history and has areas of countryside that are important for nature conservation, and some prestigious new shopping and leisure developments.

However, like my hon. Friend, I am conscious that there are still pockets of previously used land, especially on the Thames estuary, that suffer from dereliction and contamination and where improvements to the environment are a priority. There is a need to attract new jobs to the area, and to create opportunities for local people to learn new skills and make more rewarding use of their existing skills. We also want to reduce the number of people who have to leave the area every day to work elsewhere. I know that such daily commuting adds to the congestion that is a common occurrence, especially for those trying to get in and out of Canvey Island.

Regeneration of the area in accordance with the principles of sustainability to which the Government are committed must be a clear objective, and we will do all that we can to encourage that process. Regeneration can best be achieved through partnership and co-operation between local authorities, local people and local businesses. My hon. Friend talked about a local partnership.

The policies and proposals in the Castle Point local plan and the emerging Essex and Southend replacement structure plan, which have been subject to full public consultation and debate, set out the strategy for future development in the area. It is right that decisions about the scale and location of new development, whether intended to provide houses or jobs, should be made by local people. However, there is also a strong regional dimension, which my hon. Friend recognises.

Local authority development plans are part of a framework, which must continue to be set by regional planning guidance, so that what happens in south-east Essex is not divorced from the spatial strategy for the wider region. It is the role of regional planning guidance to consider whether there are, regionally or sub-regionally, suitable areas or broad locations for major housing, business, retail and leisure uses.

At regional level, regional development agencies can play an important role in encouraging and attracting economic investment to areas such as south-east Essex, where that is urgently needed, and in supporting regeneration. The RDAs for the eastern and south-eastern regions have published their strategies for improving the region's economic performance and enhancing its competitiveness. They will need to be reflected in the final RPGs for those regions.

I do not need to remind the House of the changes we have made to the preparation of regional planning guidance. From being top-down statements of generality under the previous Administration, we intend that they should from now on embody an agreed spatial strategy for each region. The strategy will be agreed by the interests in the region. Those groups will integrate spatial planning with economic and transport planning and incorporate a more sustainable approach, bearing in mind the needs of local communities such as those that my hon. Friend described, and those who live, work and take their leisure in the area.

As my hon. Friend knows, RPG is subject to a public examination. Preparation of RPG for the south-east and the East Anglia is now at an advanced stage.

As the House knows, Serplan's draft RPG for the south-east has been subject to public consultation and a public examination. It is now necessary, following the public examination, for the Secretary of State to consider the panel's report and all the representations that have been made on the draft RPG. We want sustainable development in the south-east to be the basis for continued economic growth. We cannot carry on building in the dispersed pattern encouraged by the previous Government. However, as has been illuminated in the wider debates, including recent debates in the House, since Serplan published the draft RPG there are clearly some issues that need to be carefully addressed before we go forward to the final RPG.

We hope to be able to publish proposed changes to the draft RPG shortly, and my hon. Friend will understand that I cannot say more at this time about those changes. However, they will be subject to full public consultation.

My hon. Friend has made a powerful case for the Thames gateway to be extended beyond its present boundaries to include Canvey Island, and I understand her desire for that to be given the green light. There is no doubt that the whole of the Thames gateway, from London to Essex and north Kent, offers huge potential. We have a range of sites, acres of development land and a real commitment from central and local government. The Government are committed to co-ordinating the delivery of policies at a level never seen before and recognising the importance of an approach that combines environmental, economic and social objectives. We are working with partners, especially local authorities and regional development agencies, to bring together the support available and needed to make sure that the Thames gateway is developed in a way that maximises the benefits for everyone. As the economies in the Thames gateway prosper, we expect them to bring beneficial spin-offs to neighbouring areas, including those in Essex.

The proposed extension of the Thames gateway boundary to include not only Canvey Island but the whole of Castle Point plus Southend, part of Basildon and the area of Thurrock fronting the river that is not currently within the gateway is strongly advocated by Essex county council and the district authorities concerned. As my hon. Friend said, it has been raised by Serplan as part of the review of RPG for the south-east. Serplan's draft RPG emphasises that the Thames gateway remains a key regional priority and states that its designation should be extended to include Castle Point, Southend and part of Basildon. The draft RPG also identifies the extended Thames gateway, embracing south-east Essex, as a priority area for economic regeneration—a specific priority area.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, the Crow panel report—the report on the public examination of Serplan's report—did not consider an alteration of the Thames gateway boundary to be necessary, so there is a conflict between it and Serplan's recommendations. I know that that is one of her concerns. As I said in relation to the draft RPG as a whole, I cannot therefore comment on the merits of the proposed boundary extension at this time—I know that she understands this—because that would pre-empt the formal consultation process and the Secretary of State's consideration of the matter, which he is actively undertaking at present. However, I can say to her that the Government are under no obligation to follow the Crow report blindly. We are taking account of the panel's recommendation in the light of all the material factors and making an assessment of how the regeneration of the Thames gateway and those areas adjacent to it can best be achieved. We have before us the different views from Serplan and the district councils on the one hand and the panel on the other.

My hon. Friend has made a strong case and I have heard her very clearly. I shall ensure that her views are fully considered. I thank her for giving me the opportunity to provide that assurance and to make those points to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eighteen minutes to Nine o'clock.

BILL PRESENTED

NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. Secretary Mandelson, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Secretary Reid and Mr. Secretary Murphy, presented a Bill to make provision for the suspension of devolved government in Northern Ireland and the exercise of certain functions conferred by or under Part V of the Northern Ireland Act 1998; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 7 February, and to be printed [Bill 61].

Orders of the Day

Carers and Disabled Children Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.34 am

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I beg to move, That the Bill be read a Second time.

Although I am in my 30th year in the House, I have never before had the good fortune to win a high place in the private Members' ballot. It is not until one does so that one realises how many friends one has. In my case, most of them vanished almost overnight when I decided to introduce this measure—although not, happily, the right hon. and hon. Members in the Chamber today, who are, I am sure, as passionate as I am about the need to assist carers. That is not to say that other right hon. and hon. Members do not care, but their main concern when befriending me was clearly to steer me in another direction, which was their first choice.

The mountain of mail that one has to cope with from individuals and organisations is enormous. Perhaps the most ironic experience was having to deal with almost half a rain forest from those who wished me to introduce the Newspaper and Magazine Recycling Bill. That is a very worthy measure, however, and I wish my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith) every success in getting it through.

I am also grateful for the cross-party support I have received in launching the Bill. This is truly an all-party measure and if, as I hope, it gets on to the statute book, it will reflect a great deal of credit on the House. I give particular thanks to the sponsors who span the political divide. In addition to the usual stalwarts with an interest in this area, including my hon. Friends the Members for Halesowen and Rowley Regis (Mrs. Heal), for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn), I also have support from three former Conservative Ministers—the right hon. Members for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) and for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), both former Secretaries of State for Health, and the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe). I also have the support of the Liberal Democrats in the form of the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard). I am pleased to see my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), a great champion of carers, in his place—and, indeed, right hon. and hon. Members of all parties

I am particularly delighted that the Government have lent their support to the Bill. With that kind of support, and a fair wind, we might be able to celebrate a stunning victory for carers. It will, in my view, be a victory not only for carers but for parliamentary democracy, for the Bill is about freedom, choice and flexibility. It will give carers the help and support that they need to enable them to continue caring.

I chose the Carers and Disabled Children Bill because I, like most Members, have recognised over the years that the carers in our society should be given more choice and flexibility to allow them to carry out their caring role. I decided to see whether I could build on the provisions of the measure introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks), who is now the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment—the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995. I pay tribute to him for his dedication to carers in getting such an important measure on to the statute book. However, my Bill goes beyond the 1995 Act, in so far as it will help all kinds of informal carers—husbands and wives caring for their spouses, parents caring for their ill or disabled children, and adults caring for elderly patients, to name just a few. It will do that by allowing local authority social services departments to assess their need for support and help them in their caring role by giving them what they need in the form of services.

The 1995 Act was a great step forward when it was introduced. For the first time, local authorities formally took into account the carer's ability to care before arranging services for the cared-for person. But, as I said, this Bill goes beyond the 1995 Act in many important respects. In a nutshell, it gives carers enhanced rights to assessment of their own needs; it gives local authorities powers to provide services to carers in their own right; it builds on the freedom and the choice that direct payments give people by allowing carers direct payments for their services, and it ensures that parents, too, can receive direct payments for services to their disabled children.

Many of us, at some time in our life, will care for someone else. We give care willingly to our nearest and dearest because we love them. For some, this caring role will become a larger part of their life, taking up more of their time, because someone close has become ill or disabled. The care provided by carers is not provided on a formal basis by organised, paid professionals. Informal care delivered by family and close friends is provided on an unpaid basis. It is care that draws on feelings of love and duty.

[Mr. Tom Pendry]

Caring is often very hard work, and can be emotionally draining. It takes many forms within a range of relationships. Although the circumstances that lead people to become carers may be different, many of the difficulties faced by carers are common. The impact on their lives of caring can be similar: distress at seeing a loved one in pain; emotional loss as the nature of the relationship changes; effects on other relationships; a sense of isolation and loneliness; and feelings of stress and depression.

In recent years, there has been a growing recognition of the importance of informal care and its effects on carers. I have known many carers over the years. In Stalybridge and Hyde alone, there are perhaps just under 9,000 carers—roughly one in eight of my constituents. I have been amazed by the amount of support that they have given to elderly, sick or disabled relatives. I have been struck by the fact that, even though they are providing substantial amounts of care, relatively small changes can improve the quality of their lives. I hope that my Bill will go some way towards doing that.

I do not believe that we can afford to ignore the needs of carers. There is a strong social and moral argument for supporting them, but there is a clear economic imperative as well. There are an estimated 5.7 million carers in the United Kingdom. The support that they provide for their elderly, sick and disabled relatives is estimated to be worth £34 billion a year. If we ensure that carers are able to care and are given the means to care in ways that preserve their health and well-being, we shall avoid the enormous costs that would be associated with any breakdown of caring.

My Bill is concerned with carers at the heavy end. In other words, it caters for those who provide regular and substantial care. An estimated 1.7 million carers provide that level of care, giving 20 hours or more a week in support to a disabled or ill person. Some 855,000 carers provide more than 50 hours of care a week.

Those carers are people like Sheila, who has cared for her daughter for 37 years. I do not want carers such as Sheila, who spoke movingly at the launch of my Bill on Tuesday, to be refused help because the person for whom she cares has refused a community care assessment. Caring for her daughter is enormously stressful, and she spoke on Tuesday about the many times when she had been desperate for support after nights of broken sleep, worry and constant care.

Sheila's daughter has epilepsy and mental health problems. Over the years, she has developed a deep mistrust of professionals. I want people such as Sheila to have their needs met in ways that give them more choice and flexibility. I am pleased that the Government have raised the profile of carers. The most significant development has been the publication of the national strategy for carers, which was launched by the Prime Minister on 10 June 1998. Incidentally, 10 June is my birthday, should anyone wish to make a note of it.

Next week, on Tuesday, we shall celebrate the first anniversary of the strategy's publication. At its launch, the Prime Minister stated that we must take our work to support carers further, and my Bill will do just that. Caring for carers is a vital element in caring for those who need care. What carers do should be properly recognised and supported. The Bill will take us one step further towards achieving that.

Those who have studied the Bill will know that it is longer than the average private Member's Bill. It is also complex. However, the right hon. and hon. Members who have read it know that the Bill will provide a legislative framework to bring about simple changes that will make a big difference to carers' lives. The Bill strikes the right balance between providing strong support and recognition for carers and respecting the individual rights of disabled people. I thank everyone who has given me advice and support on the Bill, including officials from the Department of Health and the Carers National Association.

I should like to set out in a little more detail how the Bill attempts to turn the principles that underlie it into practice. Clause 1 provides that a carer who is 16 or over has the right to an assessment from a local authority of his or her ability to provide, and continue to provide, care for the cared-for person.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman not only on coming high up in the ballot, but on introducing a Bill of this kind. Before he begins his detailed discussion of the Bill, will he tell us what conversations he has had with local authorities or their organisations about the impact that the Bill will have on them? How do the local authorities see themselves fulfilling the obligations and duties that the Bill would lay on them?

Mr. Pendry: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his constructive intervention. I have held discussions with local authorities—my own in particular—and with caring organisations. There is certainly a grey area, in that the authorities do not know exactly what the impact will be. However, they all seem confident that they can cope with the Bill. In addition, clause 9 contains a financial provision, which will provide a stop-gap by which we can assess the Bill's effects if, as I hope, it becomes an Act.

Clause 1 also provides that a carer should have a right to an assessment from a local authority if the carer provides or intends to provide a substantial amount of care on a regular basis for another individual aged 18 or over, and the carer asks the local authority to carry out an assessment of his or her ability to provide and continue to provide care. That would be particularly helpful where the cared-for person had refused an assessment for community care services or the delivery of community care services following assessment, as is the case with Sheila's daughter.

Clause 4(1) amends section 1 of the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 and enables local authorities to take into account, for the purposes of an assessment under clause 1, any carer's assessment previously carried out under the 1995 Act, where the information may be material. That assessment would enable the local authority to decide whether to provide services to the carer under clause 2. The local authority would have to consider the assessment and decide whether the carer had any needs in relation to the care that they provided for the person cared for. The authority would then decide whether or not it could provide services to meet those needs and whether or not to provide them.

That decision would depend on whether the cared-for person had refused help from the local authority or whether it would be more appropriate for the service to be provided direct to carers to support them in their caring role or maintain their own health and well-being.

This is a very important change to the way in which social services departments may provide support. The aim of the Bill is to focus on enabling those who choose to care, and whose care is wanted by another person, to do so without detriment to their own health and well-being. The Bill is sensitive to the complexities of the relationship between the carer and the cared-for person.

Clause 2(3) states that some services, though provided to the carer, may be services that could be delivered to the cared-for person by way of community care services. If such services are delivered to the carer, they may not, except in prescribed circumstances, include anything of an intimate nature. There is a power to set out in regulations what is, or is not, a service of an intimate nature. Services that may only be delivered to the person cared for might include dressing, feeding, lifting, washing or bathing.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether the provision of services directly to the cared-for person could happen when that person had refused an assessment? Could the services be provided against the wish of the cared-for person?

Mr. Pendry: As I understand it, that could happen, but it would be done after discussion with the local authority.

The Bill does not offer the carers of adult users the right to determine the services to be delivered to users. Nor does it give local authorities the power to provide carers with services that are of an intimate or personal nature. However, the Bill recognises that users of services—cared-for people—and their carers are closely linked. The Bill ensures that local authorities can look at meeting carers' needs as well as meeting the needs of the person cared for.

The effect of clause 4(2) and (4) is that, where a local authority is deciding whether to provide a particular service to the carer under the Bill, or to the user under community care legislation, the authority must make it clear who is the recipient of that service. For example, it must make it clear who will be liable for any charges, or who may complain in relation to the service in question.

For many carers, a break from their caring role is a key issue. However, a short-term break does not mean the time that a carer needs to spend away from home for such tasks as buying the weekly shopping. A break that helps carers maintain their health and well-being is an opportunity to have a life of their own. In particular, it is the chance to spend time with family and friends—or indeed with the person for whom they are caring, but free from their usual caring responsibilities.

There are two important issues that dictate whether carers will enjoy a break: first, that there is flexibility in the timing of the break; and secondly, that the additional services provided to the user benefit the person for whom he or she is caring. For a carer to enjoy a break, it is particularly important that the person who is usually cared for is content with the type of additional support that is given.

Clause 3 enables the Secretary of State or the National Assembly for Wales to make provision in regulations for local authorities to issue vouchers for short-term breaks. That scheme will offer carers and the people who are cared for flexibility in the timing of the carer's break, and choice in the services delivered to users while their carer is taking a break.

A typical situation would be that a carer was assessed by the local authority as needing regular breaks from his or her caring role. The local authority would need to assess the user's need for additional support to allow that carer to take a break. The cared-for person may choose to have vouchers rather than directly provided services. It is intended that the regulations will include provisions for vouchers—whether for money or for the delivery of a service for a period of time—to be redeemed by the voucher holders, at a time of their choosing, for services delivered by local authority approved providers.

The short-term break voucher scheme will introduce a simpler way of achieving more flexibility and choice in the delivery of short-term breaks than is currently available via direct payments. It is important to the users of social services and their carers that they have that choice and flexibility in the timing and nature of services delivered to meet their assessed needs.

It is especially important for carers—who give so much—that they are recognised as individuals in their own right. They must have more choice for themselves concerning the way in which they care, and more control over their lives. At present, disabled people may ask their local authority to assess their need for support to live independently in the community and, as an alternative to receiving services from the local authority, can have the money to purchase the support that they need.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Is my hon. Friend aware that, in my constituency, the local authority is already holding consultations with NCH Action for Children to set up respite care for disabled children, to provide information and to give outreach support? Does he agree that that would fit well with what he wants to provide through his Bill?

Mr. Pendry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing our attention to that excellent scheme. Local authorities take different approaches to these issues, but I am sure that they will all welcome the Bill.

Clause 6 would add a new section to the Children Act 1989 to extend the option of direct payments to parent carers to meet the needs of their disabled children, and to disabled children aged 16 and 17. The responsibilities of parent carers are often made more arduous by the difficulty of accessing mainstream services—for example, child care, including after-school clubs and leisure activities. When parent carers do not think that services are sufficiently tailored to meet the needs of their family, direct payments offer more choice in service delivery.

The clause adds a further section to the 1989 Act to enable the Secretary of State or the National Assembly for Wales to make provision in regulation for local authorities to issue short-term break vouchers to parent carers. The extension of the option of direct payments to 16 and 17-year-old disabled children may be helpful for young disabled people who want to become more independent; for example, because they want to go into further education or to move away from home.

Clause 7 enables local authorities to charge carers for the services they receive. There is some controversy about charging, and many organisations have approached me on that point.

Mr. Hammond: Would that clause provide for the means testing of any cash payments or vouchers that were provided?

Mr. Pendry: I was about to say that we need to examine that matter closely in Committee. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be helpful in that regard. Carers look after friends or relatives who might otherwise be a cost to the state and a charge on the taxpayer. There is much feeling among those carers that they should be given a better deal. I understand that talks are taking place in the Department, so I hope that the Minister will be helpful.

Although it would not be possible for a private Member's Bill to try to change Government policy in these matters, I would welcome some response from my hon. Friend on charging for social and other services. I have talked to caring organisations and listened to their concerns and am convinced that we need to amend the measure when it goes into Committee. I hope for support from both sides of the House. I cannot quite see a smile on my hon. Friend's face, but he is a caring man and I am sure that he will listen to our case.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I very much endorse the hon. Gentleman's remarks on the need for a comprehensive consideration of charging policies. I look forward to the Minister's comments on that point.

Does the hon. Gentleman share the concern of several organisations that the interaction of clauses 2 and 7—in relation to service provision and charging—could lead to a perverse outcome, whereby the carer is asked to pay for services for the disabled or elderly person? As a consequence, the carer's means rather than those of the cared-for person would be assessed.

Mr. Pendry: That issue has been raised with me. However, I am assured that that would not be the outcome. I accept that the matter causes concern, but we can iron out its ramifications in Committee.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on introducing the Bill. He has told us that it does not yet contain all the refinements that he wants; one understands that, given the processes of government, he may have had to dilute the measure slightly. I assure him that I am willing to put myself at his disposal, as I am certain is my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). We have considerable experience of drafting amendments, which he may find useful.

Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman may be aware that, last year, during the proceedings on the Protection of Children Bill, the Minister expressed his gratitude to my right hon. Friend and I because we tabled some amendments to that measure, ensuring that it was satisfactory and efficient. We are willing to give that assistance again.

Mr. Pendry: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, especially as he achieved something that I failed to do—he got a smile from the Minister.

The point is well taken; we need to reconsider the matter. However, following the introduction of the strategy outlined in "Caring about Carers", the Government have made a special grant of £140 million over three years, to ensure that local authorities provide a wider range of services to support carers. We must acknowledge the Government's generosity in that regard.

Mr. Hammond: According to the hon. Gentleman's figures, there are about 1.5 million carers providing substantial care. Will he confirm that the Government's generosity would deliver about £50 or £60 a year per carer?

Mr. Pendry: The hon. Gentleman stuns me with his arithmetic. I shall reflect on that statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene on his excellent speech, and I hope that he will forgive me for doing so. While he is reflecting on the question posed by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), he may want to remind the House of how much special and specific grant was ever made available by the Conservative Government to benefit carers.

Mr. Pendry: With my all-party hat on, I deliberately tried to avoid such remarks—although such comments are allowed from my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench.

I hope that this important Bill will be allowed to go to Committee and that it will speed its way on to the statute book.

10 am

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I welcome the introduction of this Bill by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). He is well respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House and has made a good start in his contribution to a Bill that is important to many people.

Carers have a very difficult task. As Members of Parliament, we all meet people in our surgeries who are struggling to look after relatives or other people. Carers sometimes feel that the welfare state and the structure of society do not take their needs into account.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the efforts of carers are not always recognised and they are certainly not always rewarded. Many say to me, as they say to all hon. Members, "If I didn't care for my relative and he became a burden on the state, think what it would cost you." We are all very much aware that carers save the state a lot of money and it is better that relatives look after relatives and partners look after partners. Anything that we can do to facilitate that role would not only save us a considerable amount of money, but would make people's lives much easier.

The problem is very much a case of the straw breaking the camel's back. A little help, respite, support and care can make the carer's whole task easier and ensure that everyone who is cared for has a better deal. As Conservative Members have already made clear, we shall consider the Bill constructively, if not uncritically. We shall have to consider the detail in many of its clauses. The offer of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) is helpful in the sense that he can crawl over a Bill, find snags and be helpful—when he wants to be. I am sure that he will do that.

Great Britain has an estimated 5.7 million carers. One in six—or 17 per cent.—of households contain a carer. That is a vast number of people, even it is aggregated out on a constituency basis. In the south-west, the area that I come from, 12 per cent. of the adult population are carers. The burden falls more on women than on men. I have met many women who look after their partners. They have terrible problems lifting their male partners and suffer from back and associated problems. In Britain, 58 per cent. of carers are women and only 42 per cent. are men. Although the latter figure is higher than I thought it would be, nevertheless the burden falls rather more on women. Nine out of 10 carers care for a relative. Those are pretty important statistics.

Many carers not only have to look after their loved one or partner, but 20 per cent. of them do so for more than 20 hours a week. In fact, 4 per cent. of carers have to provide care for more than 50 hours a week, which is a substantial amount of time. Those who live with the person for whom they care spend the most time on the task. Apart from that, carers try to lead ordinary lives. In addition to looking after a relative, they work, shop, catch the bus and have to deal with the problems of congestion and returning home. The burden on such people is substantial.

Representations make it clear that the Bill, particularly clause 1, gives a recognition to carers that perhaps did not exist in the past. The Bill is very much welcomed by most of the organisations that sent in comments. However, I hope that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde will not mind if I focus on some of the concerns raised, rather than on the positive points, of which the Bill has many.

The Carers National Association expressed its disappointment that, under clause 1, parent carers—parents who care for disabled children under the age of 18—will not be able to benefit from the Bill. They will not be able to receive services in their own right, because clause 1 refers explicitly to people who care "for another individual aged 18 or over".

At present, parent carers and their disabled children can receive holistic family services under the Children Act 1989. However, carers say that the child is the focus of such services and, although that is right, it overlooks the need of parents. The Carers National Association does not believe that it is the Government's intention to exclude parent carers and hopes that the issue can be resolved either by amending the Bill or by strengthening the guidance in the Children Act.

Clause 2 makes provision for a local authority to provide any service that it believes will help the carer. That service might involve direct contact with the person cared for, but the Bill states that the service must never be intimate. However, the Carers National Association points out that the Bill does not define what is meant by an "intimate service". Although the Bill provides for regulations to define an intimate service, it does not state when or whether they will be published in draft form for consultation first. It is important that the definition is published.

Concern has also been expressed that carers will be charged for services, and such concern is inevitable. The Carers National Association is concerned that carers will be charged for services that would otherwise have been provided to the disabled person. The crucial words are in clause 2(3), which states:

"A service, although provided to the carer . . . may take the form of a service delivered to the person cared for".

The problem is that there is a power to charge service recipients in section 17 of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983. It gives local authorities the power to charge the person to whom the service is provided for non-residential, community care services.

Concern has also been expressed that clause 1 will give a local authority discretion to decide whether to provide a service. Many people believe that the burden should be on a local authority to explain why it is or is not providing a service. People who have been assessed and who expected some support would like a social services department at least to explain why it is not providing support if their application has been turned down. They would be a little more satisfied if they received an explanation.

Mr. Hammond: Is not the most likely explanation of a social services department's decision not to provide services simply the fact that it does not have the resources available? Are not people likely to find that an unsatisfactory explanation, as it reintroduces the concept of a lottery into the question of who does or does not receive care?

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I was about to come to that problem, because we have an assessment system that creates expectations. Although this is a private Member's Bill, I suspect that the Government may well smile on it, and there will be financial implications for local authorities. If people are not to be disappointed once the Bill is enacted, there will have to be planning and further resources to assist local authorities.

As I said earlier, it is a false economy not to do something for carers. If the straw breaks the camel's back, many more people will look to the state, so there will be much more expense. From the caring and financial points of view, it makes sense to focus on the problems of carers.

The Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation expressed concern about the potential problems arising from the direct payments provided for in clauses 5 and 6. Although RADAR has welcomed the introduction of direct payments for disabled people aged 16 and 17, it notes that there is a danger that a conflict could arise between the carer and the person for whom the care is being provided. It argues that it is crucial that there should be clear policy guidance about how such conflict would be resolved and that local authorities should uniformly apply the guidance.

The Council for Disabled Children and the Local Government Association seek clarification on how to ensure that a proper balance is reached between parents' and young people's wishes and feelings, which was the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) in his intervention. Parents might need respite care for their own survival, but a young person might not wish to use available services.

Clause 7 deals with charging. The Carers National Association believes that the clause is the most problematic part of the Bill because it gives local authorities the power to charge carers for services provided to them. At present, only the user can be charged for services. The association is opposed, on principle, to charging for non-residential community care. Carers already devote their time and money to caring, so why should they pay for a service that helps them to continue caring? Many people will refuse services because of their inability to pay. That is a knotty problem.

I turn now to respite care. I served for several years on the Wessex regional health authority, and I remember being impressed by doctors and others at a seminar who talked about the benefits of respite care. As a nation, we have not made enough provision for that over the years. Respite care is important because of the burdens on carers and the long hours that they put in. Mencap is concerned that the Bill does not give carers a right to respite care and that no resources are allocated for it in addition to those that have already been announced.

We know that many social services departments are hard-pressed, and there will certainly be a great deal of pressure on them to provide respite care. We know also that there may be differences, which affect benefits, between respite care provided by the national health service and that provided by social services. When local respite care is provided by the NHS, it is judged to be hospitalisation, so many people find that they lose benefit when their loved one goes into respite care for a few days. That, too, is a knotty problem. There is sometimes an artificial division between social services and the national health service.

I broadly welcome the Bill. There are many matters that need to be sorted out in Committee, and I hope that that will be done, but many carers throughout the country will give the Bill a big cheer. The Government have a responsibility in this matter. After all, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde is to some extent following the strategy outlined by the Government. As the Bill proceeds, they have a responsibility to answer questions and look kindly on some of the Bill's resource implications.

It would be a great pity if, carers' expectations having been raised by the intoduction of a Bill that recognised their needs, life remained difficult for many local authority social services departments. We all know that, despite the funding discussed in yesterday's local government debate, many of those departments remain hard-pressed and have to juggle the serious demands made on them.

10.13 am

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): I welcome the general tone of the speech made by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms). Some of his detailed points may have momentarily depressed my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), who has much more experience of the House than I have. However, when I sought to pilot through the House what is now the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, such specific questions about my Bill remarkably vanished when, on the eve of Third Reading, Mrs. Thatcher said, "There isn't anything here that we can't deal with." I hope that my hon. Friend will feel comfortable with that assurance.

I regarded clause 8 of the 1986 Act as precious, and it was supported by my hon. Friend. I warmly congratulate him on his good luck in achieving a high place in the ballot, but more importantly on his good judgment in choosing such an important and relevant subject.

The Bill adds to the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks). I shall not make political points. I was shadow spokesman on community care for a number of years and led for the Opposition in proceedings on the Children Act 1989. Although we had difficulties in implementing the 1995 Act, there was a basis of agreement on both sides. What matters today is what mattered in previous years: the political will to see the Bill through the House and to recognise the will of Parliament.

Not only has my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde achieved that in presenting his Bill for Second Reading, but he has under his belt a firm Government commitment in the money resolution. That is the response to the points made by the two Conservative Members who have temporarily left their seats. Not every private Member's Bill has that commitment. With that start, my hon. Friend will get a fair wind, and we want to support him in that spirit. I am glad that I seem to have given good news even to the hon. Member for Poole, for whom I have great respect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde is providing a focus on an idea whose time has come. We all know from our constituency experience of the problems of the many carers. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Poole mentioned that there are about 5.7 million carers. It is difficult to define the role of informal carers, but if those people—men and women, young and elderly—did not demonstrate the dedication that they do, the strains on the Treasury would be untenable. When my hon. Friend's Bill is enacted, as I hope it will be, his wise proposals will not save the Treasury money, but even so, we have a responsibility to carers and those for whom they care which my hon. Friend is admirably addressing.

I welcome my hon. Friend's specific proposals. The vouchers are workable and realistic. My local government experience leads me to think that they will be welcomed by local authorities, a point raised earlier by the hon. Member for Poole.

One of the Bill's most inviting features is the measure to make direct payments to 16 and 17-year-olds. When the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), was acting for the then Government and I was speaking for my party, there was no difference between us on the principle of direct payments. Local authorities were urging us to introduce them, and they were right. We had doubts about how many groups direct payments should cover and how they would work.

We are in a stronger position today to assess the success of direct payments. I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Minister will have time to expand on the statement made by the Minister of State, Home Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), on 8 February 1999 and whether the Government think that in time such payments could be extended further. We are concerned about the over-65s and those with learning difficulties. We who are involved with disability issues as members of the all-party group on disability have always accepted that many of the measures we want must be evolutionary in nature—they cannot be achieved overnight. The step forward represented by my hon. Friend's Bill is extremely welcome.

With the provisions on direct payments, my hon. Friend has addressed one of the most serious issues that I have encountered during my years travelling about the United Kingdom—including Scotland, although the Bill does not apply to Scotland. He will know that one of the greatest worries of parents of young people with learning disabilities and physical disabilities is what will happen to their offspring when they leave formal education. If the provision for 16 to 17-year-olds is implemented, the future of those young people will be much clearer; that will be far more reassuring to their parents than anything we have so far achieved. That is a wonderful step forward, which will be welcomed by the 19-plus groups throughout England and Wales and by parents. The impact on carers of the Bill, coupled with previous measures and the Government's positive approach, will be profound. The time is right.

We have all encountered in our constituencies people who have become more frail with age, dealing with offspring who have learning and physical disabilities, who have, over time, become bigger and heavier and more difficult to cope with. The hon. Member for Poole raised questions asked by several organisations, but I am sure that he acknowledges that they support the Bill none the less. My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde can reply to those organisations, by saying that, if we do not deal with the stresses and strains imposed on carers in those circumstances—elderly people trying to cope with adult offspring—we will find, with increasing frequency, the relationship between carer and person cared for breaking down, ending in two people becoming institutionalised. If my hon. Friend's Bill prevents such occurrences, it will both be socially right and save local authorities, the NHS and the Treasury money that can be usefully spent elsewhere.

I congratulate the Library on preparing an excellent research paper, which, referring to the national strategy for carers report, states:

> "Among carers who spend at least 20 hours a week caring—nearly half of them had been caring for more than five years—49 per cent. had not had a break since they began to care. Six out of 10 carers, who lived with the person they cared for, felt unable to leave that person unattended for as little as 2 hours."

My heavens, that is real dedication. Are they not entitled to the support of the House as well as the sort of support that my hon. Friend's Bill offers? There is great demand for the services that carers supply. Even though they are often motivated by sheer love and affection, they need the sort of practical support that the Bill offers. We must address a variety of circumstances: carers help sick people, disabled people and people with mental illness. As a result, carers themselves often experience huge psychological and emotional stress. We all want to relieve that stress, as do local authorities, which have told us that that can be achieved by providing modern, up-to-date home care, day care and, above all, respite care. People who have not left for longer than two hours the person for whom they have cared for five years are entitled to a bit of help—enough time to enable them to do a bit of shopping and anything else they need to do to recharge their batteries.

My hon. Friend's Bill admirably addresses the social inequalities experienced by disabled people and their carers. Of great importance is the fact that it will help the many children who are carers for adult disabled people. The Library paper states:

> "The report of a survey of young carers undertaken in 1997 and published in 1998 concluded that the needs of many young carers were still unknown and unmet. Only 11 per cent. of young carers in the survey had been assessed for services, and only 5 per cent. under the Carers Act. The report said that the position of young carers as a group appeared to have changed slightly for the better since 1995 but there was considerable scope for improvement."

Mrs. Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the problem is the invisibility of such children? For many years, carers as a group were invisible, but child carers continue to be so. Education authorities and schools have a role to play in identifying children who bear such a huge burden.

Mr. Clarke: I agree. My hon. Friend speaks from great experience, as a former president of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and provost of Cumbernauld and Kilsyth. I am glad that she has raised the question of education and the role of education authorities.

I welcome the vision enshrined in the Bill. Many of the individual issues raised today will be dealt with in Committee, and an evolutionary approach will take us further still. Whatever questions are put to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and the Carers National Association by those who have campaigned for many years—including Mencap, Lord Rix, and the National Centre for Independent Living, headed by that formidable woman, Jane Campbell—it is important to recognise that they have all welcomed the Bill. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would rightly rule me out of order if I referred to Scotland, because the Bill does not cover Scotland, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will acknowledge the views of the Carers National Association for Scotland, especially because his Bill will become a beacon for the rest of the UK and Europe.

The Bill is welcome. It gives a large number of people both rights and responsibilities, but I believe that they will welcome the challenge. People working in the field will always ask for more resources, and they are right to do so. The Government are in a strong position to respond.

Almost a year ago to the day, on 8 February 1999, the Minister of State, Home Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South said in his excellent announcement on carers that the Government would provide £750 million to promote independence—the sort of independence that my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde welcomes—and £375 million for vulnerable children. Given that fair wind, the excellent Bill introduced by my hon. Friend has every prospect of success. It deserves to succeed, and I am delighted to give it whatever support I can. I wish it well on its travels through the two Houses of Parliament. I believe that my hon. Friend strikes the right note and I wish his measure godspeed.

[Mr. Clarke]

10.30 am

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I echo the concluding comments of the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke). The Bill deserves to succeed on its own terms, but more importantly because of the people to whose quality of life it will make a substantial difference.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on his initiative in choosing the topic as the basis for his private Member's Bill. On behalf of the Liberal Democrats, I wholeheartedly support the principles that underpin the measure. Although there are specific points of detail that may be the subject of closer consideration in Standing Committee, which I hope the Bill will reach, it marks a step change in the House's attitude to carers. For that, the hon. Gentleman deserves the thanks of a great many people outside the House, not least in my constituency where many carers provide many hours of support for loved ones and others.

At the outset, I shall refer briefly to my own experience in my constituency. When we discuss such matters, we bring to the debate our experience from our constituency surgeries, casework and face-to-face contacts, which we reflect on, evaluate and learn from. In my constituency we have a local carers forum and a local branch of the Carers National Association. We are lucky also to have a carers centre, which underpins all that is being done in Sutton and allows carers' voices properly to be heard by the local authority and other service providers.

I am repeatedly struck by the fact that carers feel undervalued and isolated at home. Last year, I had the opportunity of spending a day with Lilian, a carer in my constituency, who for the past three years has been caring for her husband. He has dementia, one of the cruellest conditions. A person with dementia is there physically, but not in any other practical sense.

I spoke at length to that constituent, who is intensively involved in providing care and support for her husband. What came across most powerfully was her desire to have a life outside that caring role, without feeling guilty. If the Bill enables people like Lilian to get more support for their needs, in addition to support for the person for whom they are caring, their lives will be substantially improved. They will be able to shoulder the burden of care—although they do not see it as a burden—for far longer.

The Bill builds on the existing community care and carers recognition legislative framework. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde also referred to clauses that amend child legislation. It marks a step change by giving carers a clear right to an assessment even when, as we have heard, the disabled or elderly person who is being cared for chooses not to take up the right, under the community care legislation, to an assessment of his or her care needs.

The hon. Gentleman described the main features of his Bill, so I shall not repeat them as other hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. The Bill makes an important distinction between the rights of the carer and the rights of the person cared for. It extends direct service provision to carers. For the first time, local authorities will have the power to provide services for carers.

The introduction of vouchers may cause concern in other contexts, but in this case would be a powerful tool for giving users control and allowing carers to shape the services provided for them and for those in their care. That is particularly relevant in respect of short-term respite breaks.

With the best will in the world, large organisations such as local authorities cannot always tailor their services to meet individual needs. They cannot always provide a slot for a respite break when it is most needed. Although voucher schemes will have some logistical impact on the ability of local authorities to deliver, they are vital to allow carers and those for whom they care to choose when, where and how respite is taken. That is crucial to the dignity of carers and a recognition of their value.

Another important advance that the Bill would bring about is the extension of the scope of direct payments to carers and to young disabled people of 16 and over. Estimates of the number of heavily involved carers range from 1.75 million to 2 million. Even by the criterion of 20 hours of care a week, 1.7 million carers are potential beneficiaries of the measure. Of those, it is estimated that 1.2 million provide physical and/or personal care for elderly people.

There is no doubt that those figures represent an under-reporting of the true number of people who undertake caring responsibilities. There are far too many hidden carers in this country, especially younger carers, perhaps caring for their parents, who are not picked up in the general home surveys. We need to do more to make sure that we uncover not just the statistics, but the people.

In my borough the statistics reveal that there are 20,000 carers, but far fewer than 10,000 of them are identified as being in receipt of services or as having been assessed. Much more needs to be done to turn the statistics into the names and addresses of people who could benefit from the proposed services. The Bill does a great deal, but it does not address that issue, which is fundamental to developing services for carers.

Clause 1, which provides new rights of access, is welcome. One or two concerns have been raised and need to be dealt with in Standing Committee or in the Minister's response. We hope that there will be scope for amendments to add, for example, parent carers of adult children. It would be interesting to know why they were not included in the scope of the Bill. Another way of addressing that omission, without recourse to primary legislation, would be through new guidance to local authorities under the existing legislation on children.

Clause 2 gives local authorities powers to provide services for carers which are incidental to the care of the disabled or elderly person. Carers need services in their own right. They may need counselling—for example, to provide them with strategies for coping with a person in the early stages of dementia. They need training—perhaps for lifting. Many, though not all, need support groups. Such services require funding. There is anxiety about the precise wording of the clause because it appears that some of the provision for services that is provided directly to the disabled or elderly person could be given to the carer instead. Clearly, the devil will be in the detail of the regulations. It is vital that giving support to carers does not mean that the disabled or elderly person becomes more dependent on the carer. It is important to maintain a dual focus on the needs of the carer and the person who is cared for. We should not undermine the sense of independence that we wish to give the elderly or disabled person.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde referred to intimate services and said that the regulations would define them. We would welcome the opportunity in Committee to explore the potential definitions. The earlier we see draft regulations, the better for hon. Members and for the many organisations that represent disabled people, elderly people and carers. Intimate services are crucial for someone who suffers from dementia. Inadequate services for dealing with incontinence are a key trigger for going into residential care. I would be interested to learn more about what will be included in and excluded from the definition of intimate care. Carers need support to undertake tasks that often lead them to give up their caring role when they may not wish to do that.

Anxiety exists about the charging powers in clauses 4 and 7 and their relationship to clause 2. Clause 2(3) states:

"A service, although provided to the carer . . . may take the form of a service delivered to the person being cared for".

We need further clarification. It would be wrong if local authorities could assess the carer's means and charge the carer for the care package, rather than the current position whereby the local authority assesses the disabled person's means. Some disabled people, because of their means, do not have to pay for services, or they pay a lower rate. The local authority should not be able to use the new power to switch the financial burden to the carer.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde gave me some welcome assurances. The anxiety is genuine, and the issue has been raised by various organisations. The Minister's body language suggested that we should not be concerned. I hope that he will clarify how the relationship between the two charging policies will work.

Mr. Hammond: I have another problem with clause 2(3). My reading of it suggests that it will be difficult for services that do not include intimate services to provide any real respite for the carer. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has considered that problem.

Mr. Burstow: The hon. Gentleman is right to make that point. The Carers National Association and others have expressed anxiety about what the definition will cover. We will have to explore that in some detail in Committee.

Anxiety has been expressed about extending the principle of charging. I hope that the Minister can give us some idea of the time scale that the Department has set in which to publish its new policy statements and frameworks for charging. Many local authorities are waiting for that and are almost paralysed; they will not recast their charging policies, despite the pressure to do so, because of budgetary constraints. Charges are a disincentive to taking up services—the assessment or the service itself. Clarity about the Government's view of the way in which the Bill, and the charging regime that it might introduce, will complement existing charging policies would be helpful.

Clauses 5 and 6 are welcome because they extend the principle of direct payments. More control for the service user is vital because it provides choice and a sense of independence. The clauses achieve the necessary balance between the rights, needs and wishes of the carer and those of the disabled or elderly person. It is vital that we do not further institutionalise the disabled or elderly person by giving a disproportionate amount of power to the carer.

Clause 9 is perhaps the nub of the Bill. It deals with the way in which the measure will be financed. A money clause is welcome, and I applaud the Government for supporting the Bill by including that provision. The Bill will have cost consequences. If it does not, it will not deliver anything. The Government are realistic in including such a provision. When the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 was considered, the Association of Directors of Social Services estimated that its implementation would cost a modest £40 million. I have seen no assessments of its actual cost, but because no additional funds were provided at the outset, assessment of needs has been extremely slow.

Funding is essential to implementation. The social services inspectorate stated in a report:

"We did not find that assessments and reviews for carers were routinely part of social services practice. Many staff were . . . unclear about entitlement . . . Explicit carers' assessments were rare although staff would often claim to have carried out some form of implicit—and unrecorded—assessment."

Carers' assessments are different from taking carers' views into account. Most local authorities claim that they do that. It is crucial that the assessments are properly funded and that plans of action to support the carers are put in place. The carers' grant that has been mentioned is an important foundation to underpin the development of services for carers. We might quibble about current funding through the carer's grant, but it is a useful way of channelling resources to develop that aspect of the service. In the long run, we believe that specific grants should be included in the general revenue support grant so that local authorities retain some discretion about the way in which they provide services.

Flexibility is the key to developing services for carers and disabled people. Sitters' services and care attendance schemes are more acceptable to many people. However, sitters' services are not widely available—surveys have revealed a patchwork quilt of provision. I am fortunate that there is an organisation called Voluntary Sitters in my borough. It provides the sort of short-term support to which the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston referred. Carers are often not prepared to go away even for two hours. Sitters' services provide crucial support, which enables people to get their hair cut, do some shopping and live their own lives for a short time. That can make so much difference to the quality of their lives. A massive expansion of such services is required, but the infrastructure for that does not yet exist. The voluntary sector and the public sector need to do more. The carer's grant is welcome if it primes the pump for those services.

Resources are everything. My local authority has received a 2.8 per cent. increase in its standard spending assessment for social services. That is well below the national average. Consequently, it has to consider charges for day care services for people with learning disabilities to bring it into line with neighbouring authorities. I attended a carers forum in my borough before Christmas, and the matter was debated there. I met parent carers of adults with learning disabilities. They expressed their anger at being told that they have to pay charges after having cared for and supported their loved ones informally for years. That is outrageous. That is not a criticism of the local authority, which has to make those hard choices, but it is absolutely the reason why local authorities such as Sutton and many others need the Government to provide the framework that they promised in the social services White Paper in 1998. That framework is still not with us today.

The principle that the Bill establishes above all else—and it is absolutely vital—is the separation of the rights of the carer from those of the disabled or elderly person. Access to assessment, services and direct payments would no longer be matters in which the disabled or elderly person and the carer would be fettered. That can be a problem in some relationships and the Bill would facilitate its removal. That is welcome, but the principle should also apply to the benefits system and the carer should be able to gain access to invalid care allowance without having to show that the cared-for person is in receipt of attendance allowance. Currently, ICA is paid only to carers who support a cared-for person who is in receipt of attendance allowance, the middle or higher rates of disability living allowance or constant attendance allowance. The gateway to ICA is through the take-up of benefits of the cared-for person.

Although we know that more than 1.7 million people each provide more than 20 hours of care a week, only 400,000 carers are in receipt of ICA, which is a small benefit and small recognition of and support for their caring role. It does not include people of pensionable age, but they incur additional costs as carers. Indeed, they are excluded, as are people who earn only £50 a week. There are other effects as people who provide a great deal of care do not receive the recognition they need. For example, carers will receive the state second pension only if they have a record of entitlement to ICA, but many heavily involved carers will never have such a record and so will never receive that benefit.

We wholeheartedly support the principles enshrined in the Bill and give it our full support. We hope that it will complete all its stages and look forward to exploring the detailed questions in Committee.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): I am pleased to be called to speak. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on both finishing so high in the private Member's Bill ballot and on introducing this Bill, which is certainly one I would have liked to introduce myself. A year or so ago, I introduced a ten-minute Bill that would have given people a right to respite care, which I shall discuss in more detail later.

The national carers strategy does the Government great credit. We have waited a long time for it. I have tried to tell my constituents and carers' groups about the strategy, but even now there is a fair degree of scepticism. Carers have had their hopes raised on many occasions and it has taken them a long time to accept that legislative changes will affect their lives in due course. Why did it take until the last few years of the 20th century for us to introduce rights for carers? Does not that reflect the history of our social services—which has been so different from that of the national health service, in which we enshrined the principles of universality and comprehensive care more than half a century ago? Changes in social care have been piecemeal, and different groups—children, people with physical or learning disabilities and those with mental health problems—developed rights at different times. By the 1990s, carers, too, were developing rights.

The Bill draws on the work of the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks), and I am glad that it has all-party support. My interest is of long standing. When I was 18, during what young people now call the gap year, I worked for Lambeth social services in a low-level clerical job. I provided carers or disabled people with holidays, which were then called recuperative holidays; they went to Margate for a week. That job gave me a great personal insight into the role and lives of carers.

I later had the privilege of working for Mencap, learning more about the role of carers who looked after people with learning disabilities. For most of my professional career I was a university lecturer in social policy with an academic interest in and commitment to the education of people who go into a career in the social services.

In 1998, I introduced a ten-minute Bill—the Disabled Persons and Carers (Short Term Breaks) Bill—on behalf of Mencap, with the support of other voluntary organisations such as the Carers National Association. I am pleased that some of its principles have been incorporated into this Bill, although it does not go as far as my ten-minute Bill. If I am involved in Committee, I hope that we can make further representations to the Government.

It is estimated that there are about 9,000 or 10,000 carers in Monmouthshire. Last summer, I had the great privilege of bringing a couple of them to the annual garden party at Buckingham palace. We were allowed to invite party supporters, but I thought that the carers in my constituency were more important. I understand that 9,000 people attended the garden party; I could have filled it with the carers of Monmouthshire alone. That thought had a profound impact on me.

To its credit, the Bill enshrines the right of carers to ask for an assessment of their needs. Some carers in my constituency will still be sceptical about that, because they know what it is like to go through assessment after assessment and not receive the services that they are assessed as needing to help the person for whom they care. That point needs to be considered very seriously.

Clause 2 enshrines the important principle of giving local authorities powers to provide direct to carers services such as counselling and information as well as physical help, training and advice on lifting, to which other hon. Members have referred. On services, it says:

"The local authority must consider the assessment and decide" whether any service will help the carer to provide for the disabled person. But there is a danger there. What will the local authority consider people to be in need of? What is considered worthy in one area may not be considered worthy in the area next door.

We return to the fact that we have never enshrined universality in our social care sector as we enshrined it in the provision of health care services. Territorial injustice has always been a problem in our social services. Services might be provided in one area, although similar needs might not be met in another, for whatever reason—perhaps political priority.

Hon. Members have referred to the work of young carers. I have had a little contact with them and attended one or two conferences. I have been struck by the fact that some young carers do not look after people with clear physical disabilities, but parents in their 20s and 30s who may have drug, alcohol or mental health problems. They care for them in intolerable circumstances and often with little support.

I am pleased that the Bill applies to Wales. There was concern when the national carers strategy was published because it related only to England. It was the duty of myself and other Welsh Members to make it clear that we needed a similar strategy in Wales. There are 300,000 carers in Wales, 50,000 of whom provide care for more than 50 hours a week. There are 2,500 young carers aged under 18. The National Assembly for Wales, and particularly the Health and Social Services Secretary, Jane Hutt, should be given credit for having allocated £9 million over three years for the strategy. I hope that the amount can be increased as a result of the Bill.

Monmouthshire has developed a carers strategy. It is probably behind the times compared with some other authorities, but I am glad to have been at its launch. A newsletter was recently published and sent to all carers; there is support for carers through organisations such as Crossroads; there has been a carers week; and the need for a carers' centre has been recognised. However, there are problems. In an area of 300 sq miles, with market towns in the four corners of the constituency, where should the carers' centre be? Clearly, four or five centres would be better because carers will have transport problems if there is only one. Many carers are unable to get around because of the problems involved in caring for others. We need carers' centres in a number of areas.

I welcome clause 3, which reflects the ten-minute Bill that I introduced the year before last. According to Mencap, which helped me with my Bill, 100,000 people with severe learning disabilities and their carers are not receiving respite care. Only 32 per cent. know about respite care, and almost one in five carers who apply for it are refused it by a local authority or health authority. When the Bill is enacted, I hope that those will become statistics of the past.

In recent weeks and months I have met groups of carers in my constituency. They have stressed the value that they place on respite care. It provides opportunities to meet new people, for personal development, to be independent and to enjoy a new environment. Short-term breaks and respite care have the same attractions for people with disabilities as for the rest of us. The carers whom I have met say that they need short-term breaks to allow them to lead a more ordinary life. They need to recharge their batteries by going away for a few days, or even a few hours. They need to spend time with their partners or families, to see friends, to catch up with the housework, to go shopping or simply to sleep. According to Mencap's research, four out of 10 carers had not been out for an evening in the past six months.

We are talking about people who are socially excluded. They cannot enjoy the expectations of life that the majority of us take for granted. One mother wrote to me:

"I am very grateful for the 3 hours per week respite that we have through our Mencap Family Carer, but I am conscious of how fortunate we are compared to most others."

That comes from someone receiving just three hours respite a week.

A short-term break could mean a break in the carer's own home—a sitting service. It can be inexpensive, but the value of such a small investment can be immense. I did not consider introducing a voucher scheme in my Bill, but it will be welcome, notwithstanding the reservations that people have had about such schemes for other services such as pre-school provision.

Respite care can also be cost-effective. Research by Dr. Peter Frost of the university of Brighton has shown that by supporting carers we can maintain their health, thereby reducing the cost of hospitalisation and breakdown. Respite care can also help carers to return to work, reducing the cost of benefit and increasing the revenue from national insurance and taxation. If carers could not or did not care, the responsibility would fall even further on the state. Employed carers would be paid, receiving time off and annual leave, whereas care is currently provided for nothing by the vast army of carers.

I wish my hon. Friend every success with the Bill. If I can be of help on the Committee, I shall be happy to serve. It is a great achievement that we have a national carers strategy under this Labour Government. The Bill will put part of that into action.

11.4 am

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on introducing this welcome Bill. I also congratulate him on coming so high in the ballot. I was also on the list, but much lower down than him, so my congratulations are particularly personal.

All my Conservative colleagues join me in welcoming the Bill. Its objectives are wholly commendable and it is consistent with what has been trailed for some time. However, I am disappointed that the Government have not given the Bill sufficient priority and found time for it in their legislative programme, leaving it instead to take up valuable private Member's time. I declare my personal interest: in the light of the Prime Minister's comments on Tuesday to the National Farmers Union, I hope that the Government will consider supporting my Food Labelling Bill, which is due for its Second Reading on 3 March.

The Bill we are considering today extends beyond the family, but its underlying principles are rooted in a sense of family; it is fully consonant with a commitment to the family and the recognition of carers who make provision for their loved ones within the family. I have seen that in my life. My mother and my wife are both nurses who have been concerned with caring for the terminally ill. My family has lived in a nursing home for the terminally ill that offered respite breaks. Those caring for their relatives could arrange to have them sent to the home under the supervision of my mother for a month while they went on holiday or otherwise caught up with their lives. That was a valuable service. However, it was a private sector service restricted to those who had sufficient means. The welcome aspect of the Bill is that it provides an opportunity for a greater extension of those services and provisions.

The focus must be on resources. The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) talked about that in detail. There are two basic issues. The first is the resources at local authority level for those who are already receiving some support. I recently had a case at my surgery involving the devoted and caring parents of a 26-year-old who was severely mentally retarded. They gave him the most amazing care. Their situation had been assessed and they had been awarded 83 days per annum respite care for the previous two years. That was welcome and clearly necessary because both parents were beginning to get on in years.

However, all of a sudden, because of a limitation of resources, the 83 days were reduced by letter to 51 days. That is still not bad, but that is not the point. The parents needs had not changed. They still needed those 83 days to recharge their batteries so that they could provide proper care the rest of the time, which is clearly exhausting. It is also important for carers to know that they have a set amount of time when they will be released from their burden so that they can plan and set targets and goals. The Bill is a welcome move forward in looking carefully at the needs of carers.

Assessments produce certain expectations, and if services are reduced or denied due to a stretching of resources, serious difficulties may arise. If the Bill becomes law, its detailed provisions will have to be worked out with care and consideration. It will be important to make sure that there are adequate resources, so that once an assessment has been made, and provided that the needs have not changed, there are no arbitrary variations in the support that is provided purely because of annual financial considerations.

Another, perhaps more important, aspect of the Bill is the need for resources to provide the services in clause 2, which have been mentioned in previous speeches. Subsection (2) states:

"The services referred to are any services which . . . may take the form of physical help or other forms of support."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) said, one of the most significant aspects of caring involves lifting and turning the patient. The professionalism and ability of carers to turn patients and help them to avoid bedsores is often regarded as a test of the effectiveness of the care provided. A commitment to training is absolutely crucial, and may be a more effective use of resources. Training is important not only for lifting, but for the regime of turning patients if they are bedridden or seated for long periods of time.

I am interested in how the Bill would operate in terms of resources. The explanatory notes mention training, so perhaps the Minister will say something about that in his response to the debate. I am also concerned about charging, which is covered by clause 7. Although I understand the framework that is set out, one of the benefits of the Bill will be to encourage carers to feel that their good work has been recognised. However, the charging regime in clause 7 may result in people refusing services because of their inability to pay or their concern about the level of the charges. It is important that the good intentions of the Bill can be translated into action—and that will require resources. It would be useful to examine how the charging provision will operate in practice, so that it does not become a deterrent. I look forward to hearing more about that.

Finally, in respect of the financial provisions in clause 9, I am unclear about what the Government envisage and the extent to which they are working with local authorities to ensure that there are adequate resources. I hope that the Minister will clarify that in his response to the debate.

I welcome this important and necessary Bill, which, at last, fully recognises the significant role of carers in society. My hon. Friends and I are happy to support it.

11.15 am

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): I shall not spend long discussing the details of the Bill as it is important to look at the bigger picture. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and many others, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks), and my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) on their work in this field. I could continue mentioning right hon. and hon. Members, but the real congratulations should also go to some of the people who have been campaigning to make carers a big issue.

I see the Bill not as the first step, but as part of a strategy that has suddenly gained pace. I should also congratulate the Minister and the Government on their role, to which I shall turn later in my speech.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) and my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth spoke from personal experience. I consider myself fortunate in that I have never had long-term responsibility for caring for someone. We can attend forums and talk to constituents, but we can never understand what it is to be a carer unless we have experience of caring.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston always used to tell people, "At some stage in your life, it is likely that you will suffer some disability and find out what it is like to be disabled." It is also likely that at some point in their lives, most people will be a carer. Recent studies show that, in a typical lifespan, six out of 10 people are likely to undertake heavy caring duties and that the chances of becoming a carer increase with age. Even those whose attitude is, "I'm looking after No. 1" should remember that at some time in the future they may need the provisions that we are making today.

The common-sense argument for the proposed changes in the Bill and the overall strategy are overwhelming. It is obvious that we need to do something to help carers. I have heard many debates about who should be responsible for community care and whether social services should take more of the burden off the national health service. In reality, the majority of community care is undertaken not by the national health service or social services, but by ordinary carers who are devoted to members of their families. Those carers save the Government some £34 billion. That is an awfully big resource, and a resource that we cannot afford to ignore. If we do, carers will burn out and cease to be able to act as carers. They may become ill themselves, which means that the burden—not just in relation to the person being cared for but in relation to the carer—falls on the state. We end up providing a higher level of service because we could not provide the necessary support in the first place. I welcome this Bill because it provides that support.

I said that I had no personal experience of being a carer, but I do have one small experience about which I wish to tell the House, as it left a lasting impression. My wife used to work for social services in a residential home for people with disabilities. The home took the residents for a weekend trip, and wanted volunteers to assist. My wife kindly volunteered me for a weekend at Butlins in Skegness. People might agree that there may be grounds for divorce in that, but it turned out that Skegness—although it is always fairly bracing—was quite sunny. We had a pleasant weekend, and the company was excellent. I had a good time, and it was fulfilling and rewarding.

I was a second-class carer, as the residential workers carried out any unpleasant tasks. My tasks were menial, but what stays in my mind was how exhausted I was at the end of the night and at the end of the weekend. That made me think—what if I had been caring not for a weekend, but for a week, a month, a year or a lifetime? That is the reality for many carers. We must make sure that we provide support for those lifetimes.

In some respects, the Bill is just a step forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North proposed the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 under the previous Tory Administration, and that was a step forward, but it did not deliver in all respects. The proposals were not taken up, and carers recognised that. I was pleased to see the fresh impetus that was given to the matter by the incoming Government.

It was no surprise that one of the first groups that the Prime Minister invited to No. 10 Downing street was carers, and it was significant for them to receive that level of support from someone so senior. There was an immediate recognition by the Government that something needed to be done quickly. As a result, the Deputy Prime Minister launched the national strategy for carers in February last year, and the proposals in the Bill are in the strategy document. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde decided that we must implement the proposals: it is a question not just of fine words but of producing concrete proposals on which people can work.

I want to congratulate those in local government and the health service, who have been putting the local plans together. We heard from my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston that £750 million had been put aside to help develop people's independence, and that £375 million has been put aside for children's initiatives. The initiatives under the national strategy are significant, with £20 million going in this year, £50 million next year and £70 million the year after that.

Local organisations have asked me what is to happen after the three years. We know that money is there now, but I was asked to lobby for the money to remain and, if possible, to be increased in the future. I can tell my hon. Friend the Minister that I am lobbying now: I want that money to remain and to increase after the three years. We need to ensure that the necessary resources exist.

I want to congratulate local organisations working within the national strategy who have spent money locally. We often talk about partnership—it is a buzzword—but I see real partnership in the work in Nottinghamshire between local authorities, health authorities and voluntary organisations which are putting together plans to ensure that people can have respite care. They are producing practical plans that aid people, and the Bill will help to make that more possible.

The Bill builds on what has gone before, but it introduces something which is sadly lacking and much needed—flexibility. The Bill recognises that there is a diversity of carers. The majority are women, but almost as many men are carers also. That fact has not come to the fore. Carers range from the very elderly to young children, and we need plans and proposals for those young children.

The Bill recognises that there is not a stereotypical carer, and that what might be appropriate help for one carer is not appropriate help for another. We must have the flexibility to allow local authorities, carers' organisations and carers themselves to develop the plans that suit them as individuals—not what is foisted on them by the state or by any organisation. Let us give them what they want, because in many respects they are giving us what we want.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): This morning, we have heard many congratulations. I, too, wish to congratulate all the organisations mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell).

It would be remiss of me not to congratulate my hon. and very good Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), not only on his good fortune in being selected in the private Members' Bill ballot but on introducing a Bill that is important to the people of Scarborough and Whitby. My hon. Friend has been very kind to me over many years. I would go so far as to suggest that he has been a sort of mentor to me in terms of learning about Parliament and the business of being a parliamentarian. I am honoured that he approached me to sponsor his Bill.

Scarborough and Whitby is a large part of the county of North Yorkshire. Until fairly recently—1974, in fact—it was part of a large, rural and mixed local government area. Following the 1974 reform, the previous Government saw fit to separate the City of York from the county of North Yorkshire, making it a unitary authority. I am glad to say that, in the important matter of carers, there is continued partnership between the new county of North Yorkshire and the new unitary authority of the city of York.

For all the statistics about which we have heard, the true figures are invisible because they have not been properly collected. In doing research for this debate, I tried to find statistics for my area. The most recent figures that I could find were compiled in 1994—they are very dated figures—when the Policy Studies Institute concluded that the work done by carers nationally amounted to the equivalent of £30 billion.

[Mr. Lawrie Quinn]

That staggering figure is more than the combined budgets of central and local government for health and social services. It suggests that in North Yorkshire and the City of York, with about 73,000 carers, the care and public service amount to the equivalent of about £400 million a year. If we brought the figures up to date, it would not be beyond any mathematician to show that nearly £500 million of work is being done in that area alone.

People do that work for love and out of a sense of duty and care for their immediate family. They have real dedication and commitment. I want to bring in a personal dimension. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East mentioned the fact that one in six households has a caring responsibility. That means that it is likely that one in six hon. Members has such a responsibility. I am not a carer, but I am one of those people who have to care for a carer. I have not heard that phrase this morning, but it is an important factor.

Many hon. Members have spoken of how the commitment and dedication to loved ones can burn out lives. Recent figures suggest that only about 18 per cent. of carers get access to respite care or even to assessments from local authorities. There is a huge hidden problem: it is the classic iceberg syndrome. Damage is being done not only to individuals but to the fabric of society. I can see that in the small villages and hamlets of rural North Yorkshire.

There is a terrible loss of potential. Carers lose the opportunity to play the fullest part in everyday life. The Bill gives them flexibility in determining the assistance that they can buy in to the home. I know, from my personal experience of trying to persuade my wife to take time off from her responsibilities for caring for her mother, and from people who visit me in my constituency surgery, that that is crucial.

Six months ago, a distraught family came to my Whitby surgery. They had thought that they could define the service that they needed to suit their circumstances in one of the most remote villages in my constituency, but when they tried to buy in the individuals whom they wanted to support their loved one, they were caught up in bureaucracy and red tape and the notion that the social services department knows better, when in fact the loved one would have been more comfortable with the specification that they had defined.

The Bill gives the carer the opportunity and the resources to define the support that they need. I am extremely pleased that, by virtue of clause 9, the Government and the Treasury have shown that they are willing to make the finances available for that.

I think back to the days before I was a Member of Parliament, and to a previous Administration and the debates that we had on the fine Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks). The difficulties always came down to the fact that the resources were not there. Resources are the crucial element. The all-party support this morning is tremendous. This is not a partisan issue.

Before entering Parliament, I was an engineer. In my maiden speech, I said that throughout my career I had been involved in solving problems, not creating them. It is a great pleasure to be involved in legislation that continues that process. Many hon. Members have referred to the groundswell of opinion in favour of a policy whose time has come, and it is deeply regrettable that the financial resources were not there before.

When the Bill was published, I got hold of copy early and did the proper thing in trying to consult my colleagues in local government. I was referred to Mr. Andrew Cousins of the Association of Directors of Social Services. I did not know it this time last week, but he is the director of social services in Gloucestershire. I was unable to speak to him because, sadly, the past week has been taken up for him by the tragic and regrettable events of last Friday night in the surgery of the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones). I can imagine the tension and frustration of some carers who have come to my surgeries and I can understand how they can sometimes be on the point of boiling over.

I have also witnessed the problems of carers when the loved one is no longer there and the caring responsibility has gone. The carer's purpose in life has gone, and that is a big problem, especially in remoter areas where people can feel isolated and detached.

I pay great tribute to Scarborough and Ryedale carers resource centre, which is based in Pickering and does a tremendous job. It forms a network for the many carers in the area and ensures that carers receive key advice. However, as I have said, some 80 per cent. of carers in my constituency do not recognise that they are carers. My estimate is that at least 12,000 people in Scarborough and Whitby are in that situation—and they make up a large part of the social fabric of my constituency. If they are supported, it is through the partnership of North Yorkshire county council and City of York council, but at the point of delivery the support is provided by the voluntary sector and the mutual support of other carers.

The Bill offers us the opportunity properly to support those performing a caring role in our society. It is essential that the Bill is given a fair wind and, like my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), I wish to offer my services to assist the progress of the Bill. I do so both for personal reasons and to speak up for my constituents and the many people in rural communities such as those in North Yorkshire. We have an important opportunity in this Bill to solve a problem—to melt the iceberg—and ease carers' burden of responsibility. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister winds up he will be able to answer one simple question for the people of Scarborough and Whitby, and those who work in the resource centre I mentioned earlier: who cares for the carers?

Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Halesowen and Rowley Regis): In the knowledge that I am repeating what has already been said, I wish to add my personal congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on coming first in the ballot and on his excellent good sense and judgment in choosing this issue for his Bill. I am delighted to be able to contribute to the debate, having worked for so many years on carers' issues. It gives me particular pleasure because I was also involved in the development of the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, which was sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks), when I was working for the Carers National Association.

The Bill is welcomed by carers and disability organisations, as well as the many carers who are likely to benefit from it. However, many people will not immediately recognise how the Bill could improve the quality of their lives, simply because they do not recognises that they are carers.

Over the past 20 years, great steps have been taken in recognising the situation of people who care for relatives or friends at home. Carers have been recognised in policy statements, but have not always had their needs met with appropriate services and support. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn), I recall a carer saying, "Who cares for the carer?" This Bill will go a long way to providing some of the care and support that they need. It makes good moral and social, as well as economic, sense to support carers.

We have heard estimates that one in eight people in Britain are carers, which is some 6 million people. Of those, we estimate that 1.7 million could benefit from the Bill. Those figures are likely to be underestimates, because many people who care for members of their family are unknown to the statutory services and would not label themselves as carers.

Carers' needs are diverse. Their first concern is always the well-being of the person for whom they care. However, emotional support, relief from isolation, receipt of reliable services, information and recognition of their role are all important in supporting carers. From experience, including the knowledge and understanding I have gained from carers in my constituency, I know that this Bill provides the right legislative framework to provide the right support for carers. That is something for which carers have been fighting for many years, and it gives me great pleasure to be able to contribute to the process.

I also feel positive that the Bill takes forward the national strategy for carers, which was first announced by the Prime Minister in June 1998. I agree wholeheartedly with the Prime Minister that we "must do more" for carers. The Bill shows that that strategy is not simply a document gathering dust on a shelf and it is not simply a pile of words and aspirations. The Bill shows that we have a real commitment to turn those pledges into practice and to ensure that the strategy makes a real difference to carers' lives.

The Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 was a good piece of legislation, but it has had its difficulties. Therefore, I am delighted that we are being given an opportunity to iron out those difficulties. The sorry evidence from the Carers National Association is that carers have been refused their own assessments, either because the person they care for refuses an assessment or has already been assessed. I welcome the fact, therefore, that the Bill will give carers a right to an assessment of their own needs even though the person for whom they are caring refuses an assessment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has already referred to Sheila, the carer from Cardiff who joined us last Tuesday. She made a great impression on all those who heard her story of everyday life. Her daughter, who has mental health problems, refused an assessment, and that may have been based on her loss of trust in the professionals who were working with her. The consequences for Sheila include nights of broken sleep, worries about the next episode, the loss of a career she loved and had trained for, and the strain of constant care. All of that has taken its toll on Sheila's health. Had Sheila had the benefit of the Bill, she would have been able to fight for something for herself.

Having worked on the development and implementation of the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, I know the importance and value of ensuring that groups of carers are not forgotten. I noted from the copy of the Bill that the new rights to assessments only cover adults over the age of 16 who care for adults. Surely it is not the intention of the Bill to exclude parent carers from that provision and I note that parent carers are included elsewhere in the Bill. I would certainly welcome further clarification on the thinking behind the drafting of the relevant clause. I know that that would be warmly welcomed by parents of disabled children and the organisations representing them, such as Contact A Family.

Secondly, I welcome the new rights that carers will be given to receive services. People like Harold and Daphne would be delighted to know that. Harold is extremely proud of the fact that he has been married to Daphne for the past 59 years. For the past 10, Harold has been quite severely physically disabled, and Daphne provides round-the-clock care. Harold gets extremely annoyed that Daphne, as his carer, cannot receive the simple services that would help her to care for him. They do not want personal care from an "outsider", as they call it, feeling that that would mean too much disruption. They want help with the housework and the gardening, and they cannot get it. It causes Daphne a lot of distress, on top of the caring that she already provides. It also means that she cannot spend quality time with her husband, something that they both miss. I hope that the Bill will give Daphne access to the help that she needs.

Thirdly, I welcome the proposed direct payments and voucher schemes. Again, I have heard many stories about how difficult it can be to have a service arranged. Carers have always said that they want flexibility and choice; they want more control over their lives, rather than someone controlling them. We have seen what a huge difference direct payments have made to disabled people's lives, and I am delighted that such flexibility is being extended to carers.

The Council for Disabled Children and Contact A Family welcome the proposal and see how it could be helpful. But they, too, have some concerns and hope that when practicable, there will be consultation with parents.

As someone who has campaigned for greater awareness of the contribution by young carers and for support for them, I am particularly pleased that direct payments will be available to young carers aged 16 and 17. While I do not wish any young person to have inappropriate caring responsibilities, I realise that many children and young people cope with considerable caring and household responsibilities to an extent that would daunt many adults.

The provisions in the Bill concerning payments for 16 and 17-year-old carers are clearly drawn, with safeguards in mind, to ensure that services are safe and that the young carer can manage the process. Local authorities, when considering offering direct payments to both groups of young people will, I am sure, take into account the principle enshrined in the Children Act 1989 that the child's welfare is paramount.

I believe that vouchers will also give far more flexibility to carers. I was struck by the case of Evelyn, who cares for her elderly father. She received the horrifying news that her daughter had been diagnosed with cancer and was severely ill. She desperately needed to be with her daughter, but could not go because it did not fit in with her time allocated for breaks. In the end, Evelyn did get time off, but it was a long, hard fight. She should not have had to fight. Again, the stress took its toll on Evelyn and, no doubt, on her daughter. Vouchers might have given Evelyn the freedom to organise her breaks differently, which is why I warmly welcome the provision.

When we talk about breaks, I emphasise that we are talking about relatively short periods of time off from caring to do the things that most of us take for granted, such as going shopping, getting a haircut, seeing a film, reading the newspaper and having a bath or shower without being interrupted. One parent carer said, "Getting a haircut makes me feel human. It's the only thing I ask for." Such breaks are vital for carers to maintain their own health and well-being.

I would also like to raise the issue of charging for non-residential care services. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde that this is an extremely sensitive area for carers and I, too, would welcome the Minister's views on it. I know that carers—and I include myself as an individual—would also welcome the Minister's assurances that it is not his intention to charge carers for what are essentially users' services.

My final point regards funding. I was delighted to see the financial provision in clause 9, which enables the Government to put funding behind the measure. After the Bill was published, I spoke to the two social service departments covered by my constituency—Dudley and Sandwell. Both asked the same question, which the Minister will not be surprised to hear, about whether resources will be put behind the Bill should it become law. Of course I realise that the next round of the comprehensive spending review is under way and that the Minister will not be able to make any specific comments about funding. However, will he consider local authorities' views about funding in his discussions on the comprehensive spending review? I do not want to see such a broadly positive piece of legislation hit by the same difficulties as the 1995 Act.

Mr. Hammond: My interpretation of clause 9 is that it refers only to additional moneys that need to be paid out under other Acts of Parliament as a result of the measure, not to moneys paid out as a direct result of its provisions. Is that the hon. Lady's understanding as well?

Mrs. Heal: I am taking the liberty of using my opportunity of speaking in the debate, with the Minister present, to ensure that all aspects of the funding for this and other parts of the Bill are noted. I acknowledge that, according to the Carers National Association, one year after the 1995 Act was implemented, three quarters of authorities said that lack of funding had restricted their ability to implement the legislation. When carers have been refused assessments, they are sometimes told that there is no money so it is not worth asking. I repeat that I do not want to see that happen here.

Both the authorities in my constituency, Sandwell and Dudley, welcomed the Bill's principles, but referred to the need for adequate financial resources to follow the implementation. They will have to provide extra social work time for assessments and they are aware that they must develop effective local publicity to encourage the relevant carers to come forward for assessment.

On the whole, the Bill has my personal backing and that of carers in my constituency. Various organisations throughout the country have welcomed it. It provides what carers have pressed for, and I am delighted to lend my support to it.

I shall refer just once more to Sheila. On Tuesday, she asked us to "work our magic" for carers. I sincerely hope that the Bill will let us do that.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on introducing a Bill that will bring support and relief to a host of carers, some of whom are in desperate situations.

I have recently learned of the case of a 78-year-old man who has looked after his 75-year-old wife for 12 years. She is housebound and requires 24-hour care. She is totally dependent and cannot be left. Carers go to the house each morning and evening to help to wash, dress and feed her, but the man is otherwise on his own, day in and day out.

In recent years, respite care has been made available for two weeks out of six. That demonstrates the huge burden that that man must carry. The respite care should provide a welcome release from his relentless caring duties. Instead, it has become a cause of distress and anxiety. Rather than reducing his mental anguish, it has increased it.

When that man's wife returns from the national health service hospital where she spends two weeks in every six, she comes home covered in bruises and, sometimes, sores. He has photographic evidence of that, spanning four years. It is evidence of, at best, neglect, or, at worst, abuse.

Why has that man not acted on that evidence? The simple answer is fear. He has a fear of losing his only break from caring. He has a fear that he would be left with the full, unrelenting burden of caring without support. He has virtually no one to turn to. He believed that the respite care his wife received was the only care available. His general practitioner reinforced his isolation because he, the doctor, had a vested financial interest in seeing the NHS bed filled.

There was no flexibility in the arrangements, and no choice. The man was locked into an NHS hospital care package that he knew was providing inadequate care. He felt trapped by the system, and as if he had no alternative. There was no recognition of his needs as a carer. A "take it or leave it" mentality existed. I believe that the Bill will ensure that his needs are assessed so that he can choose a more flexible care package, possibly bringing care into his home for extended periods.

In his daughter's words, the only recognition that that man received was the acknowledgement that the service that he provided would be more expensive if provided by the state. He was seen as a service, not as a person. The Bill should change all that. That man's needs must be assessed and provided for. He has provided unstinting, dedication to his wife for 12 years, and it time that his needs were recognised.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on securing a high place in the private Members' ballot and on selecting such an important Bill. The work of carers has often been under-acknolwedged both in the House and in the country.

My hon. Friends the Members for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) and for Halesowen and Rowley Regis (Mrs. Heal) both mentioned the national strategy for carers, which the Government published recently in a document entitled "Caring about Carers". The starting point for our debate must be what the Prime Minister said about carers in the foreword to that document. He said:

"Carers devote large parts of their own lives to the lives of other—not as part of a job, but voluntarily. And often in addition to working themselves. For the sick, the frail, the vulnerable and the elderly, carers provide help and support in ways which might otherwise not be available. By their effort, their patience, their knowledge, their understanding, their companionship, their determination and their compassion, carers very often transform the lives of the people they're caring for—even if the difficulties they're grappling with still remain. Carers are among the unsung heroes of British life."

I very much agree with all that my right hon. Friend said. His words inform both the background to the Bill and Government's whole approach to caring, as set out in the national strategy and other Government documents.

The explanatory notes provide some background on the number of carers. They state:

"Great Britain has an estimated 5.7 million carers and one in six households—17 per cent.—contains a carer. Of the estimated 5.7 million carers, 1.7 million devote at least 20 hours a week to caring. Of those, 855,000 care for 50 hours or more. Most caring is based on close personal relationships."

Mr. Quinn: My hon. Friend used the word "estimated". Is that not the central problem? Does he welcome the fact that, in the 2001 census, for the first time there will be questions to try to define and quantify the carers in our society? That will enable us better to service their needs, because an abstract concept such as "estimate" does not get a reaction from the Treasury—the Treasury wants hard figures.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an extremely valuable point. The purpose of the census question is not merely the compilation of numbers. He is correct to point out that we need a much more accurate picture not only of the total number of carers, but of where they are throughout the country. I suspect that the distribution of carers is not even; it may be greater in those areas in which there is a large pensioner population. For example, the Burnt Oak ward of my constituency has a high proportion of pensioners.

We do not merely want to find out where carers are; such a census question would also help the carers to argue their case. I am reminded of the story of Emily Wilding Davison—of which I am sure you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When the 1911 census took place, women did not have the right to vote, so Miss Davison hid herself in the broom cupboard behind the Chapel downstairs and was thus able to put the House of Commons as her address on the census form. She made an important political point on behalf of women fighting for the right to vote.

I hope that carers do not have to hide in the broom cupboard during one of their periods of respite to make political points; we are in the Chamber to make those points on their behalf. Nevertheless, the fact that the census will show how many carers there are and where they are will strengthen their arguments for a fair share of our national resources.

A large proportion of people in potential need of care live in parts of my constituency. A survey conducted by my local authority shows that throughout the London borough of Barnet there are about 30,000 carers. However, I suspect that, for the same reasons that were given by other hon. Members, the true number is much higher than that; strictly pro rata, there would be about 10,000 carers in my constituency. The true figure is probably somewhat higher than that.

The terms of reference of the national strategy for carers are most important because they also inform the background to the Bill. The terms of reference were:

"To draw together existing work within Government that impacts on carers; to take account of the emerging findings of the Royal Commission on Long-Term Care; to gather examples of best practice in providing help for carers at local level, to assess whether any key needs of carers have been overlooked; to clarify the Government's objectives for carers; to set out an integrated strategy for future action by Government."

My local authority took that to heart. During 1999, while the strategy was being developed, we formed a carers' steering group, with representation across the board. It included representatives not only from Barnet council, but from Barnet health authority, the local NHS trusts—especially Barnet Healthcare NHS trust, which provides primary care—carers, the voluntary associations supporting carers, and primary care groups. We built up a partnership, using the ideas about joint working that the Government are so keen to promote. The group used as its framework the King's Fund "Carers Compass" that sets out the main areas that carers have regarded as important to them. The Bill's terms, especially those about assessment, will draw out some of those themes.

Through its joint discussions, the group developed a series of issues that carers thought were important. The first was the issue of information. My research in reading up on the Bill has made it clear that carers find it very difficult to access the information that they need. At a basic level, that includes information and advice about the health or condition of the person for whom they are caring. The condition of the people cared for may be complex medically and carers may not know whether what they are doing is of benefit. Sometimes, out of ignorance, careers may do things that act against the benefit of the people for whom they care. Carers, therefore, need information on how to cope with those conditions, and information about the services and benefits available to them is absolutely vital.

We are all aware that the information provided by the Department of Social Security on the take-up of benefits shows how few people, who could qualify for the benefits, either know about them or claim them. In the assessment procedure that the Bill will require of local authorities, I hope that they will take on board the need to advise carers of the benefits available to them and help them to take up those benefits through the DSS. There is no doubt that research continues to show that carers have great difficulty in obtaining the information that they need.

[Mr. Dismore]

Carers want their own health needs to be recognised. They need to be satisfied that high-quality services are available to them and—equally, if not more importantly—to the people for whom they are caring. The object of the assessment is to enable local authorities to plug the gap if carers need to take time off. Careers need to have confidence in the standard and reliability of services. They want to be assured of the quality of the services provided to the person for whom they are caring both at present and for the future, such as in the event of a carer being ill and having to take time off. They need to be empowered, in some instances, to make use of the alternatives to their own care, and that is what the Bill tries to achieve.

Much has been said about the need of carers to have time off. I was very moved by the graphic examples given by hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Rowley Regis, who spoke in great depth about the problems facing her constituents. Carers need the freedom to have a life of their own and to spend time with their family and friends. Sometimes, their family is not just the person for whom they care. There is a risk that carers will become isolated, so they need to be able to spend time with their extended family and relations. They need to spend time free of the person for whom they care. That may sound a little harsh and callous, but if that relationship is to be strengthened and the bond maintained, they must sometimes be freed of their usual caring responsibilities.

The problem also cuts across the employment world. Carers often remain in employment, which is important if they are to maintain their independence. Such activity reduces the likelihood of carers becoming socially isolated and, ultimately, may result in them being able to continue caring for much longer than they would otherwise have been able to do.

We need to think about the emotional support that carers require. That may often best be met through family and friends or, in more organised ways, through support groups. I know that there are support networks in my constituency. Skilled help at particular times—for example, at the start of caring or when the condition of the person being cared for changes—can considerably assist the carer. Recent research by the personnel social services research unit in preparing its report on the evaluation of care for elderly people suggests that a carer's employment may result in an increased ability to continue to care.

Training and support care are also needed. Carers need to be sure of their financial security, and not just through the state benefits that they receive while they are caring. People in their 40s or 50s may suddenly find that they have to care for an elderly parent. If they are not able to continue work, they become worried about their own futures.

The Bill deals with assessment of present needs, but I am concerned about the problem of the future of carers when they become pensioners and their need for financial security. I mention at this point the important state second pension provisions that are being discussed in the Standing Committee on the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill, on which I am pleased to serve.

Carers have a need to be heard and want their views to be taken into account and their contribution recognised. Those who care for another person need to be recognised much more widely in society. Carers value involvement in discussions about the help provided to them and the person for whom they are caring, as well as the practical help that the Bill aims to provide. Carers have a voice not only, as my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn) said, as a political force in organisations such as the Carers National Association, but as individuals, and we must be careful to recognise them as such.

Mr. Quinn: Has my hon. Friend, when meeting carers in his surgery, encountered, as I have, the problem that they do not realise that they are in that role? Does he agree that providers of primary care services, such as GPs, need to have a better identification process and should tell those who take on these onerous responsibilities that they are indeed carers and direct them to the support networks to which he is alluding?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. An hon. Member referred earlier to the problems of occasionally caring for a relative who is sick only for at week or two at a time. I know that dealing with family illness can be a demanding task, and the thought of continuing such care for a long period is daunting. I suspect that some carers often think that the situation will last for only a week or two and do not identify themselves as playing a caring role. Unfortunately, illnesses progress and carers may unwittingly slip into a full-time caring role. They add an extra hour here and an extra day there, and before they know it they are spending 50 or more hours a week caring for a sick relative or friend. My hon. Friend is right to point out that many people do not see themselves as carers.

We have to be careful, however, not to stigmatise people or treat them as a group without considering their individual needs. The carers national strategy deals with that point. It says that local authority services

"must aim to understand carers' needs—individually and as a group. The Government believes that all services used by carers should involve them in service planning. Carers' organisations and representatives can help service providers by providing a forum in which consultation of carers about service provision can take place. Services which have one-to-one dealings with individual carers, and with the people for whom they care, need to make sure that the carer is involved and consulted about the services which he or she needs."

The London borough of Barnet's local strategy did not aim only to bring together the partnership group, which I mentioned earlier, to try to identify what it thought were the issues—in its second stage it conducted an important survey of individual carers' views and needs. Individual assessment is intended to allow service providers to judge the state of carers' health, their needs and wishes and their ability to continue to care, if that is what they want to do, or to bring informal caring to an end, if that seems right for the carer and the person being cared for. That is an important feature of the assessments that will, if the Bill is passed, be carried out under clause 1. When an assessment is carried out at the request of the carer, the local authority might tell certain carers that it is perhaps time that they started to consider "professionalising" the care that they provide, because they are getting older and might soon start to need care themselves if they do not get some assistance.

The Bill builds on the principles of empowering service users and carers and promoting independence and choice. The London borough of Barnet has an agreed carers strategy that promotes those principles and establishes a clear direction for the development of services for carers. The Bill will allow the range of services, both direct and indirect, to be expanded so as better to meet the needs of local carers.

We have focused on clause 1 and the assessments, but they are not the sole issue: once the assessment has been carried out, the answer to what happens next is set out in clause 2. I want that clause to be strengthened. It states that the local authority "must consider the assessment and decide . . . whether the carer has needs in relation to the care which he provides or intends to provide . . . whether they could be satisfied . . . by services which the local authority may provide; and . . . if they could . . . whether or not to provide those services".

However, the local authority does not necessarily have to provide those services. We might need to address that lacuna in Committee.

The services mentioned in the clause can "take the form of physical help or other forms of support."

However, like the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), I am concerned about distinguishing between intimate services and other sorts of services. I discussed the matter with representatives of my local authority's social services department, who think that that issue needs to be clarified. They believe the answer probably lies in the fact that "care needs" will be for services provided to the person cared for, not to the carer. They told me that clause 2 was "somewhat confusing", adding:

"If it was decided that a service user had intimate care needs (including for example dressing, feeding, lifting, washing or bathing) it is self evident that this would be provided as part of their own care package and not that of the carer."

I am not sure that the Bill makes that self-evident, so I hope that the issue is addressed in Committee, either by amending the clause, or by defining more clearly in clause 10—the interpretation clause—what the phrase "of an intimate nature" means.

Mr. Hammond: Is not the point that, in the circumstances envisaged by the Bill, there may be no care assessment for the person who would otherwise be receiving care?

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because he has put more succinctly the point that I was trying to make at too great a length and in a rather confused way. It may well be that the assessment conducted under clause 1 will throw up such issues, and prompt an assessment of the person being cared for under wider community care provisions. That lacuna needs to be clarified, perhaps by the insertion of a new clause providing that, if the clause 1 assessment raises the need for a further assessment of the person being cared for, the local authority should be under a duty to carry out such an assessment. In addition to that, I repeat that "intimate care" needs to be better defined.

We must consider the sort of needs that carers have and the services that they require. We in Barnet brought together voluntary organisations, the local authority and local health workers in one group. After that exercise had identified an overall strategy, a survey of carers was undertaken to identify their needs.

Top of the list was respite care, which came as no surprise. The term "respite care" was used in the information that came from my local authority, and it is sometimes used by carers, but what is meant is a break, short or long. The term "respite care" can be demeaning and stigmatise carers. It implies that care is an onerous task—which it is—and that it is unpleasant and not properly recognised, whereas carers are, by definition, caring people and often take great pleasure in looking after the person for whom they are caring.

What sort of breaks are envisaged? A short stay in a residential care home by the person being cared for could enable the carer to have a holiday. Time spent in a day centre by the person being cared for could allow the carer to carry out day-to-day tasks such as shopping. A night sitting service could allow the carer to get a full night's sleep, which is particularly important for carers who also have employment commitments.

Someone to take the person being cared for on an outing would give the carer time to himself or herself at home. A Sunday sitting service would enable the carer to go to church or visit family and friends at the weekend, and an evening sitting service would allow the carer to take adult education classes, or simply to have a meal out or an evening out at the cinema or theatre. Daytime sitting would allow domestic tasks to be carried out. Another sort of break would be a holiday for the carer and the person being cared for together.

We must make sure that the breaks offered are fulfilling for both the person needing care and the carer. Going to the dentist should not be regarded as a break for the carer, even if a broken tooth is being attended to. In planning a short break, adequate preparation must be made for both the person being cared for and the carer.

Mr. Hammond: I listened to the catalogue of opportunities that the hon. Gentleman outlined. Will he take care not to raise expectations too high? At the risk of incurring the Minister's wrath, I say again that in 2001-02, the ring-fenced grant will be worth £70 million. By my calculation, that allows about £50 per carer who gives more than 50 hours care a week. That will not provide much from the catalogue that the hon. Gentleman outlined.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I intended to make that point at the end of my speech. It will come as no surprise to my hon. Friend the Minister that local authorities are concerned about the potential financial implications. We must be careful not to raise expectations, but the hon. Gentleman should recognise that much good work is being done.

Through the partnership approach, my local authority has put forward a comprehensive three-year plan to start identifying the problems and the ways in which needs can be met by both the voluntary sector and the statutory agencies. It is well on the way to providing many of the services required.

As was convincingly argued earlier, many of the services that we are proposing will prove cheaper to the public purse. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde said when he introduced the Bill, not only would it improve the service for carers and for the people being cared for, but it would benefit the Treasury.

Mr. Heppell: We should bear in mind that we are not starting from base zero. The idea that local authorities do not provide any of those services at present is nonsense. I recently received a letter from the Carers Federation, Nottingham and Nottinghamshire, which praised the local authority for the initiatives that had already been taken. We should not assume that we are starting from nothing and that only the carer's grant will improve the services that we are considering. Many people enjoy residential respite services, breaks at home and day-care services. We are considering expanding those services, not starting afresh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman is making another speech. Interventions must be short.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. The Opposition tend to focus on the money that central Government provide and neglect what is happening locally through social security budgets, through other agencies and through the voluntary sector.

My hon. Friend is right to say that it is worth restating not only what happens locally, but nationally. Paragraph 24 of the national carers strategy sets out the resources that the Government are starting to provide. It states:

"The Government has already announced the allocation of £750 million over the next three years to promote independence through prevention of illness, disability or disease, and through rehabilitation, and carers and the people they care for will benefit from this."

That is the overall picture. The document continues:

"On top of that, we are making available a new special grant—ringfenced funding—to local authorities for the enhancement of services to allow carers to take a break from caring. The grant will total £140 million for England over the next three years—£20 million in 1999/00, £50 million in 2000/01, £70 million in 2001/2002."

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) referred to the final figure.

I am sure that carers and those they care for, who are also electors, will realise that by 2001-02 we are likely to be approaching or on the other side of a general election. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge referred to the Government's actions after 2001-02. I assume that he believes that the Conservative party will not win a general election, and is asking for our forward plans after the comprehensive spending review in the summer. The hon. Gentleman made no commitment about the money that the Opposition would be likely to devote to caring.

Mr. Heppell: In the second year of the carer's grant, 95 per cent. of the grant will be spent on breaks, as opposed to 75 per cent. in the first year. That is another example of expansion within existing financial provision.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He mentioned the money that is available, and I hope that that will not be the end of the story. As people become more aware of the challenges and problems that carers experience, there may be an expansion of provision in the voluntary sector, and people who are not paid will provide short breaks through, for example, evening sitting services. In addition to the money, which is vital, there will be added value as the debate progresses and improvements in voluntary services.

Before I took a series of interventions, I referred to the needs that carers identified in response to the survey that my local authority conducted. We have dealt comprehensively with short breaks, but the survey identified the need for more help with transport. Unreliable transport is a problem for carers, who need to be able to plan their day. If they do not know at what time transport to the day centre will turn up, it is difficult for them to undertake any activities that they had in mind as part of the break. A range of transport services is more likely to meet the diverse needs of carers.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Rowley Regis mentioned earlier, carers need help with practical matters such as shopping, cleaning and gardening. I hope that such activities will be identified as part of the assessment to which clause 1 refers. They need a holiday and a break from the caring environment, even if that is a brief trip to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby. May I promote my birthplace, Bridlington, which is a far better seaside resort than Scarborough for a day out or a week's holiday? It could provide carers with a welcome break from the caring environment.

Carers need training not only in lifting—although obviously it is important that they do not injure themselves when moving people with disabilities—and rather personal tasks such as incontinence management, but in dealing with stress, which sometimes gets a bad name in the House and among the wider public. In my previous life as a lawyer, I often had to advise clients who were suffering from stress on how to pursue claims. I found generally that people tend to pooh-pooh stress; they think that it is part of everyday life. Of course it is: making a speech in the House can be very stressful for many of us.

Mr. Forth: No, no.

Mr. Dismore: I am sure that making a speech is not stressful for the right hon. Gentleman; he is an experienced parliamentarian.

Mr. Forth: I love it.

Mr. Dismore: The right hon. Gentleman loves making speeches, but it can be stressful for many of our colleagues. Making a speech is a one-off—we can prepare and we know it is coming—but carers face different problems. They may have to experience stress day in, day out, or the relative they are looking after may cause them a lot of stress.

Mr. Quinn: As a mere engineer, I offer my hon. Friend an engineer's definition of stress—it is the load on an area. Is not the Bill about easing and spreading the load so that stress is dispersed?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting analogy. The Bill is about spreading the load, which is why training is important. I am pleased that that features in the national strategy for carers, which says on page 60:

"Training can empower carers—by giving them new confidence".

The document deals with all sorts of matters on which people need training. I would not be wasting the House's time by describing them, but I want to make a little progress and return to the point I was making about stress. Participants in a course called "Looking After Your Stress", who valued the contacts and friendships that they had made, reported decreasing stress levels. If stress management can be taught to carers, it will make their lives a lot easier and a lot better and enable them to continue caring for a lot longer.

Carers need greater flexibility and choice in how services are delivered and the Bill goes a long way to providing that through the arrangements for vouchers or direct payment. I am particularly struck by the fact that people like to be in control of their own lives wherever possible—I had not thought about that issue until I started to research carers for the debate—and can often provide far better services that are tailored to their needs if they have the money to do so. Inevitably, there is an off-the-peg element if services are provided by a statutory agency—people get what is on offer whether it fits or not.

I know that local authorities—mine is one of them—are doing their best to tailor off-the-peg services to carers' needs, but there is inevitably a degree of coping with a services straitjacket. If we can empower carers to buy their own services as and when they need them—through either vouchers or direct payment—that will be an extremely welcome development. Indeed, carers may get more for their money in the absence of all the overheads that go with providing a statutory service.

Carers need a listening ear and someone to talk to; that is part of trying to deal with stress. I was pleased to be invited to open a good neighbours service on the Grahame Park estate in my constituency— neighbours try to help others out. On many big housing estates such as Grahame Park there is great isolation. The nature of housing estates tends to make people lock themselves into their homes at night rather than engaging with their neighbours. That isolation is part of the problem for carers. Developing befriending and good neighbour services is a way of trying to break down that isolation.

The strategy also refers to the need for better information and advice—which I have already dealt with—financial advice and carer-friendly employment practices. I do not want to run the risk of straying out of order by talking about all the wonderful family friendly employment policies that the Government are introducing, but we should recognise that the needs go beyond simply looking after children. The family includes elderly relatives, who may have difficulty looking after themselves, and relatives with disabilities. The family is more than just parents and children. I hope that as our family friendly employment policies develop, they will take carers' needs into consideration.

We need more help and advice from GPs. Part of the problem with the GP service in my area is that primary care provision is overstretched and GPs do not have the time that they need to talk to carers about some of the issues that we have discussed. If GPs had a little more time to talk to carers, they might find that their work load reduced, because if carers have more information about the condition of the person they are caring for, they may be able to provide basic care instead of having to call on the GP or the health service. It is in the interests of GPs to try to spend a little more time with carers and discuss their needs.

Mr. Edwards: Does my hon. Friend agree that GP surgeries can play an additional role by supporting carers organisations financially? One of the GP surgeries in Chepstow in my constituency has put a significant amount of money into the local Crossroads scheme.

Mr. Dismore: That is an interesting suggestion. I should like to know more about it. Perhaps that example of good practice could be fed into the debate as it develops. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would also like to take it on board.

Charging is a thorny issue. In its briefing on the Bill, my local authority mentioned the concerns that have been raised about charging carers for the services that they receive. Barnet charges service users and the level of support that it provides is determined to some extent by the costs that can be reclaimed. The same principle applies to carers when they become service users. The council will not be able to provide a service to carers unless at least some of the cost is reclaimed. We have to examine the local criteria and protocols that need to be established to clarify charging policies and practices. I am concerned that carers will be charged for some services, but that is inevitable. The charges should levied at a reasonable level. That picks up on a point made earlier by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge. If modest charging makes more money available, more services ultimately can be provided.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman share my worry that neither clause 7 nor the explanatory notes say anything about charging, other than the comment in the explanatory notes that clause 7 enables local authorities to charge carers for the services that they receive? Would the hon. Gentleman have expected at least a word such as "reasonable" or some other provision that would give us some reassurance that the charges will be levied at a level that carers can accommodate?

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that intervention, because he makes a valid point. Unfortunately, clause 7 amends other Acts. I do not know section 17 of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983—which provides for charges—well enough to say whether it specifies that charges have to be reasonable or assessed against the means of the carer or service user. Clause 7 simply tacks on a new paragraph (f) to section 17(2) of that Act. The right hon. Gentleman makes a telling point.

I was stressing my hope that when charges are levied—and that is inevitable—they are reasonable and affordable. Otherwise, all the Bill's provisions—the assessment procedure and the services provided by the Government under clause 2—will not be implemented. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will address that point in his reply to the debate.

The debate so far has focused on the problems faced by adult carers. However, the Bill also considers the position of young carers. I was staggered to read in the national carers strategy that research currently available suggests that there are between 20,000 and 50,000 young carers—children who look after their parents or elderly relatives. Many of them receive no support from statutory or voluntary services. To return to the point made my by hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby, I suspect that that is because their circumstances are not known. They may come to light only if the child is having difficulties at school, such as underperforming or even not turning up, and the school or education authority decides to investigate. Only then may it become apparent that the child is undertaking onerous caring duties.

The national carers strategy identifies some of the problems that we should be looking out for in this respect. I am pleased that the Bill makes it clear that it is essential that assessments are also made available to young people.

Mr. Hammond: I may have misunderstood the Bill's provisions. I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns about young carers, but my understanding is that clause 1 specifically does not apply to young carers. I am sure that the needs of young carers can be addressed under the Children Act 1989, but it seems to me that the Bill makes no additional provision for them.

Mr. Dismore: That depends on how one defines young carers. The Bill provides additional facilities for carers aged 16 and over. Perhaps we should consider in Committee whether 16 is the right cut-off point. There may be a case for including even younger carers, perhaps by tabling a new clause. Carers under 16 may not be in a position to ask the authorities for an assessment of their needs simply because they are not used to dealing with statutory authorities. The Bill could make arrangements for their school or GP to suggest to the local authority that such an assessment was necessary.

I mentioned earlier that such children may have problems at school—perhaps with doing their homework and getting qualifications. They also risk becoming isolated from others of the same age and from the rest of their family. They may lack time for play, sport and other leisure activities that help their development. They may face conflict between the needs of the person who they are helping and their own needs, which can often lead to feelings of guilt and resentment. They may believe that there is nobody out there looking out for them and feel that the professionals do not listen to them because they are children.

The overall lack of recognition and praise for the contribution of carers also applies to children, who may feel isolated and different and that nobody understands their experience. All that may cause problems for them as they grow up, in terms of finding work, moving into their own homes and establishing relationships. That is particularly important in respect of young carers from ethnic minority groups, where families are more tightly knit and family relationships often impose greater obligations.

I want to refer to adult carers looking after young children, and I am pleased to see that the Bill deals with them. Clause 6 extends direct payments to those caring for disabled children and parents of disabled children. The Government have made great strides in helping those who look after disabled children through their social security reforms, particularly in terms of mobility allowance for severely disabled very young children. Clause 6 develops that by providing more direct financial aid to parents of disabled children.

Disabled children will receive help to enable them to make the transition from childhood to adulthood by giving them the responsibility to look after their own resources. Equally, the provision of vouchers or direct cash payments to the parents of disabled children empowers them—a point made forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde. He said that the direct payment arrangements would help parents to make the decisions that they want to make on behalf of their children, rather than the parents being told what decisions to make because the facilities are available only in kind rather than in cash. I am pleased that we are addressing that.

The Bill does not place any burdens on the voluntary sector that it does not wish to undertake, but it allows the voluntary sector—and the business community—to expand the range of services that it provides and to market those services directly to service users and carers. That will provide a helpful stimulus to business and the voluntary sector, and an important supplement to the statutory agencies. I am pleased to support the Bill.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): I wish to join the list of those congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on introducing the Bill, which not only has cross-party support but has the support of an all-important double act—the right hon. Members for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—which means that it might actually make it to the statute book.

The Bill is a critical step forward for carers. It is only in the past four years that they have come to be recognised by Parliament as an entity whose needs we must consider in legislation. For years, they have been making the most vital contribution to society imaginable. Now, carers will have a statutory right to have their needs recognised by social services authorities.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman is right that the Bill recognises for the first time the statutory rights of carers but he is wrong to say that carers have not been recognised as such in legislation. I will seek to show later that carers have been recognised in legislation going back to 1981, and that the Bill is part of that growing recognition.

Dr. Turner: I accept the chiding from the hon. Gentleman, but this is the first time that carers have had a statutory right. That is important.

Before I came to this place, I was heavily involved in the implementation of community care legislation as a county councillor and a leading member of a social services. We recognised from the outset that if the assessment procedure did not involve the carers, it would be incomplete from the point of view of both carer and cared for, but such involvement was not the universal practice of social services departments.

There is an enormous variation in the services provided in different areas, from almost none to rather a lot. The Bill will not dictate a uniform pattern of care support services—that would probably discourage innovative authorities—but will effectively force all local authorities to examine rigorously what they do to support carers, so they will all come up with at least a range of core services that all carers need.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) has spoken of all the services that carers might need. If the Bill does nothing other than make social services departments take carers seriously and provide for them properly, it will have been worth while; but I think that it goes much further.

We need to sustain the carer. It cannot be said too often how important carers' work is. We can make rough calculations of the value of their contribution. It has been said today that it would cost £34 billion to substitute for it, and I suspect that that is an underestimate. The sum involved if all 5.7 million carers stopped caring would wipe out our entire national health service and social services budgets. Their input is enormously valuable, and they do it for love. They are people whom we must treasure above all others.

The carer's life is not fun. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) rightly said that we should all realise that any of us at any time could be pitchforked into a situation in which we feel morally obliged to be a carer, and we should certainly think about that, but few of us know what the restrictions and the lack of opportunity to socialise or have a career are like. All the things that we take for granted, even within the strictures of life in this place, are taken away; our lives are far less rigorously determined than those of carers.

I had no more than a small taste of that when I had to care for my daughter for three weeks when she was horrifyingly injured in a motor accident in the Dominican Republic, where hospitals do not have nursing staff in the sense that ours have, and families have to do all the caring. She was totally immobilised and I learned what caring was about.

At its last annual general meeting, my local branch of Care for Carers in East Sussex put out a challenge to all the politicians present to take the place of a carer for just a day. That was long enough to impress on me what was truly involved. I had the privilege of substituting for the parental care of a young teenage girl with spina bifida and severe learning difficulties. At the end of the day, I was shattered: it was incredibly demanding. One had to be so sensitive in every respect. To do the job properly, people would have to be highly trained and highly sensitive.

In such a situation, the carer cannot relax for a moment. I was a carer for only a few hours, but the caring parent—a single parent with other children to worry about—did it every day of her life except for an occasional respite break when her daughter had residential care for a few days. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon raised the issue of what such care is called, but carers do not give a damn whether it is called respite care or a short break—they just want it to be provided. That is what matters more than worries about politically correct language.

What support do we give carers? It is highly variable, but most of them certainly have little financial support. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) rightly emphasised the difficulties that carers have with the benefit system. He pointed out that few carers receive invalid care allowance—some 400,000 out of 5.7 million. Why is that? Carers are not rich—in fact, by definition they are nearly all poor. The reason is that they are nearly all on income support and it is no use claiming invalid care allowance, because it is simply taken off their income support, pound for pound. They would not be better off if they claimed, so they do not claim. That is the experience of many of my constituents.

The future changes under the national carers charter will change the position and it will become worth while for carers to claim invalid care allowance because it will qualify them for the second state pension. That is welcome, but given the onerous burden placed on carers, they should receive a weekly income over and above income support. They have to live permanently on income support, which is not designed to sustain people indefinitely. It does not provide, for example, for replacing shoes as they are worn out. It is a basic subsistence income, and carers are entitled to more than that, given the enormous contribution that they make and the saving to the Exchequer of not paying for someone else to provide care. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bring my remarks to the attention of his colleagues in the Department of Social Security, because carers should be more generously treated by the benefit system.

I would like to turn to the important issue of resources which, in the context of the Bill, cannot be taken in isolation: it must relate to the whole community care support system and its financing. That is under acute pressure, and has been since the introduction of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. The system was etched on my mind, as I was one of those at the coal face who had to implement the legislation. Under that system, the assessment had to fit the money available. We had this wonderful structure called eligibility criteria. The 1990 Act provided that eligibility criteria should match the resources available so the net goes up and down, according to the money available. That means that the resources available to provide for carers are concomitantly varied.

I take issue with one of the statements in the explanatory notes to the Bill which were written by the Department of Health. On the Bill's financial effects, the notes state:

> "The only additional costs that are likely to arise in implementing this Bill will be those relating to the carer's right to an assessment in circumstances where the person cared for has refused an assessment . . . These additional costs are expected to be contained within the existing local authority allocation."

If we are to deliver recognisably increased support for carers, as the Bill quite rightly implies, there will be additional costs. They cannot be contained within the existing local authority allocations.

Mr. Hammond: Is not the hon. Gentleman saying that the procedures under clause 2 will inevitably be subject to precisely the same eligibility criteria to which he referred in relation to other social services provision?

Dr. Turner: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He is basically right: everything in the Bill and the 1990 Act is subject to eligibility criteria and matching to resources. There is no way of arguing around that. However, we can argue about how much resource we put in and how much its intelligent use can save in the long term.

My point to the Minister—which relates to the issue raised by my wise and right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke)—is that sustaining carers will make care arrangements more sustainable. Sustaining carers for more years than they might otherwise be able to keep going without adequate care and support may save the domiciliary care arrangement from breakdown. Because when it finally does break down, either because the carer becomes unable to continue caring, or the cared-for person gets beyond the capacity of the carer to care for him or her and has to take up an institutional placement, the social services costs will increase considerably. There is virtue in putting more money into carers. I hypothesise that spending, say, £1 billion on carers would not mean an extra £1 billion in global spending because we would save in other ways—although the complexities involved make it difficult to prove that argument.

Money has already been put into the carers charter, but more is needed. The only figures that I can cite are those for Brighton and Hove, my own authority, which invests roughly £4.8 million in support for carers. That all-embracing figure covers day centres where carers are involved, and so on. In addition, the carer special grant is £128,000 for the coming financial year. In effect, the authority can increase by one third the amount that it spends on residential respite care, but there will be no significant increase for existing clients because more carers are receiving respite care. This means that no one is receiving the desirable amount of respite care. To achieve the care that highly stressed carers require, we should need a lot more money. I do not envy the Minister his task of pleading for carers in the next comprehensive spending review. A significant sum is needed both for carers and for community care as a whole.

This debate must be related to the Government's response to the forthcoming royal commission on continuing care. I share the view of directors of social services and others involved in social care that the current system, which resulted from the Community Care (Residential Accommodation) Act 1992, will not be sustainable. We must consider whether we should separate social care from nursing care, and that question has considerable implications for Government spending and for the charging of individuals who give or receive care. I do not expect the Minister to address those complex issues today. They are too big, and I am straying beyond the context of the Bill. However, the Bill must be related to the global picture.

I do not wish to be negative: I am merely seeking to be realistic about the complexities of a situation to which the Bill makes a valuable contribution. I repeat my appreciation of the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has chosen a Bill that is necessary if we are to give impetus to the national carers strategy. Carers will welcome it with open arms, particularly if local authorities are given the resources to make it work.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being in the Chamber at the start of the debate. I was in the building, but I had to deal with a pressing constituency matter. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on introducing the Bill.

Although the practical content of the measure is vital, what is even more important is that it offers us an opportunity to make a cultural or psychological shift in our attitude to carers and to people with disabilities. As a former social worker, with some experience in the field, I have no desire to bash the social work profession—plenty of people have been doing that for many years. However, it is important to realise that, although we constantly talk about enabling and empowering people, the professionalisation of caring has had the opposite effect.

We have emphasised the needs of professionals, organisations and services and have taken the focus away—not intentionally—from the needs of the carers and those who need assistance. One of the effects of the measure will be to shift that focus back where it should be—on the needs of those doing the caring and those in need of services.

One obvious example of that is the voucher scheme. It is ludicrous that people can be caring night and day, all week, and cannot ask their local authority for a break at a time of their choice. When they ask for a break, the local authority replies, "Well, you can have one at this time, in that month." That is nonsense; the priority is given to those who organise the service, not to those who need it.

The vouchers would make a significant change by putting the focus where it should rightly be—on giving respite and relief to a person who is exhausted. When a person is reaching breaking point, it is of no use to be told, "In three or four weeks, you might have a weekend off." The whole point of respite is that people should be able to decide when they need a break and should be able to have access to relief.

The direct payments scheme is welcome. It is a massive step forward in our approach to caring. In our attempts to provide higher standards of care and better quality services, we have over-professionalised some aspects of caring. In many cases, we have created a crude, paternalistic service.

I used to have the unhappy task of telling people what the local state was prepared to offer them and what it thought was appropriate for them. Perhaps I was not a particularly good social worker—although I was not alone in that—but I did not listen to what people said they needed. The brief was to tell them what was available and what they could have. That paternalistic approach has damaged the relationship between social workers and the people who need help and support. Over time, that has ground down carers and produced the feeling that people do not listen and do not care. Carers are merely talking to a local machine that is churning out the available services.

Direct payments are the way forward. They are the greatest gift that the Bill offers, because it recognises that people know what they need to make the quality of their lives better. They know how often and what type of services they require, and, by providing resources, the Bill will enable them to select them in the form that they want. That is one of its greatest strengths.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) also referred to resources. They are critical and I hope that the Minister will be able to offer us some reassurances about clause 9. I do not suggest that he should tell us exactly how much money will be available.

Mr. Hammond: One of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues drew attention to the explanatory memorandum which suggests that, apart from the administrative costs of assessment, the Bill is unlikely to give rise to additional costs. Does the hon. Gentleman take that to mean that additional sums will not arise under the provisions of clause 9?

Mr. McCabe: I said that we had lost our focus when we organised and professionalised these services, so I think that quite a lot of money is wasted in the existing administration of them. That money does not directly benefit the carer or the person who needs the services; it is lost in the local state machine. Although I do not attempt to deny that costs are attached to direct payments, it strikes me that there could be a shift of resources. If we were to put less emphasis on the local state bureaucracy and the local social worker's role and more emphasis on what individuals need, there may be scope for a transfer of resources. Nevertheless, money must be made available if direct payments are to be introduced, and I hope that the Minister will say a little more about the availability of resources.

Local authorities are generally resistant to direct payments for two reasons. They see them as expensive and as something that will lead to the loss of their power. When services are directly provided by the local state, it has immense control and power and it builds up a self-perpetuating bureaucracy. People are always needed to perform extra tasks or to do extra paperwork and administration. Local authorities are reluctant to have direct payments because they see them as a threat to their existing power and control.

We have all become obsessed with the notion of professionalised caring. There was a time when many of the services provided today would not have come under a professionalised umbrella. I do not attack the idea of higher standards or deny that people should have better training; that is obviously desirable. Many inquiries have made the case for that. However, some services may not have benefited from being over-professionalised. One example is counselling, which is a massive operation these days. People have to undergo lengthy training and to have qualifications—this diploma or that. However, 20 years ago counselling was a reciprocal arrangement; people assisted each other. It did not require such apparatus, and people got as much benefit from it as they do today.

There was a time when local authorities provided home helps, who did basic domestic chores such as cleaning and shopping. We have created home care services, which are good for people who need intensive support, but the development of those services and the professionalisation of the work mean that it is almost impossible to get a local authority home help. The notion of home helps has died. If we ask people, we find that they want someone to come and provide a little help at a set time of day, because that would make a difference to how they cope.

Mr. Heppell: Is not that why it is so important that the carers national strategy introduces a requirement for local authorities to survey carers to find out exactly what they want? If we ask them what their needs are, rather than try to second-guess them, there is a good chance that we will meet those needs.

Mr. McCabe: I totally agree that we should ask people what they want rather than try to second-guess their needs. However, we also need a culture and framework in which we respond by doing what they ask, rather than being locked into the mindset that services must be organised and provided in a certain way and people must be told what services they can have. That is the current mindset, and direct payments could change it, but we must get away from the over-professionalised notion of how services should be delivered.

Returning to the example of home helps, it is ironic that in creating more professionalised services, we have made them less available to people. Many need services at the weekend and late in the evening, but it is almost impossible for most local authorities to provide home care at those times without exorbitant costs. That results in the absurd situation of people being told when they must go to bed and what day of the week and what time they can have a bath. That is a direct consequence of the way in which we organise services because we employ people who prefer to work nine to five, and those are not necessarily the hours when people are most in need of the services.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): On the over-professionalisation of services, will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to praise the Carers National Association and, more importantly, centres such as the Harrow carers centre in my constituency, which have lobbied social services and other statutory authorities that provide care for the flexible services about which he is talking?

Mr. McCabe: Yes. A number of organisations have done wonderful work. As I said at the outset, I am not attacking local authorities or condemning social workers, but we have inadvertently organised services so that they are of least benefit to the people who are most in need of them.

Mr. Dismore: I am concerned that we do not set professional services against non-professional services. Is not the real issue the need to build a proper partnership between statutory agencies such as health authorities and local authorities, the voluntary sector and individuals to make sure that we have a properly co-ordinated service that plugs all the gaps and takes account of the criticisms that my hon. Friend has been making?

Mr. McCabe: I repeat, I am not knocking professionals or condemning local authorities and social workers. I merely suggest that we have created a structure, a mindset, a framework that over-professionalises certain aspects of the work and certain tasks. The way to address that is both to listen to carers and their organisations and to create the partnerships that will ensure that flexible care and support are provided at the times people need them.

Acting as a brake on the success of current direct payments is the fact that they can create difficulties for the recipient, because that individual becomes, in effect, an employer and faces all the red tape and bureaucratic inconvenience that that implies. When considering the implementation of the Bill, will the Minister look at ways in which we can relieve some of the pressure on individuals who have direct payments, so that they do not become locked into interminable employer obligations? Although they might have ulterior motives, some local authorities have argued that one reason that direct payment is used to a lesser extent than we might have hoped is that people find quite daunting the number of potential risks to which they become exposed in the role of employer. Is there any way to ease that problem?

Earlier, we heard about a scheme in Harrow; there is a similar scheme in my constituency, where there is not-for-profit home help agency. People contract with it to obtain the services they want at the time they want them, but the legal and employment framework is handled by the agency. It strikes me that such a system might offer an answer: it organises and controls services and, by localising them, makes them more intimate and more responsive to individual needs; it also relieves the individual of some of the unnecessary burdens and pressures that go with being an employer. We should consider such schemes. Otherwise, in trying to empower individuals, we might hamper them with unnecessary burdens that stifle them and prevent us achieving our goal.

Mrs. Heal: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important to take note of some of the complexities of direct payments, even though such problems may be different in respect of payments made to carers rather than to those cared for? I have no doubt that those hon. Members who are fortunate enough to serve on the Committee will address those problems. I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that the Bill offers carers a wide spectrum of choices, which will enable escape from the strictures of limited choice. The combination of direct payments, vouchers and local authority provision will offer a range of possible services that carers and the people for whom they care want.

Mr. McCabe: I agree, which is why the Bill is so wonderful. It will unlock people's potential and enable them to escape from the terrible environment into which we have inadvertently put them: that of being nothing more than the recipients of services. The Bill will give people the chance to open up their lives and gain greater control over them. That is what the Bill is all about.

The Bill offers a great opportunity for a culture shift. It allows us to change our approach to carers and those who are in need of services. The voucher system enables carers to have a break when they need it, rather than when someone tells them that they are entitled to one. Direct payments are the key to giving people control over their lives. We must work in partnership with others to give carers such control. That is the central element of the Bill.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on his choice of subject for his private Member's Bill. He spoke of winning friends, and I assure him that he will have won many through his contribution today.

I congratulate other hon. Members who have spoken. Many have displayed a depth of experience and knowledge that has made the debate interesting and worth while. I am pleased to see the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) on the Treasury Bench for the winding-up speeches, as he has been a major contributor to the Government's strategy for dealing with carers.

The Government rightly recognise the position and role of carers in our society. Many hon. Members referred to the large number of carers—almost 6 million by most estimates, although inevitably the figure will always remain an estimate. The essential feature of those carers is that their care is voluntary. They do it out of love and a sense of duty and obligation. In that way they contribute to our society some £30 billion worth of care.

We as a society have not only a moral obligation to support carers in what they do, but an economic imperative. The care that is provided informally in our society underwrites our national health service and underpins our social care system. The great silent army delivers care that would simply be unaffordable if it had to be provided through the formal system.

It is right and proper that the Bill focuses on the needs of voluntary carers, and in doing so underpins family and community values. We support and encourage that trend.

The starting point in the discussion about care and carers must be that care is rooted in the family, with the state and the statutory bodies providing support and encouragement for that care—not the other way round, starting from the assumption that the state has an obligation to provide all the care needs of every individual. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) developed that point admirably in his speech.

The Government have outlined a national strategy for carers, with which we are broadly in agreement. The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) described the development of policy towards carers as evolutionary. That was an inspired use of language.

I shall try to put the Bill in the context of the evolution of Government policy across Governments of both parties towards the needs and recognition of carers, and show that the Bill is part of a continuum. It is not a sudden departure or a step change, but, as the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde said, it builds on what has gone before.

In their national strategy for carers, the Government have repackaged the various strands of Government policy that deal with carers. In the mood of a Friday debate, perhaps I can say that they have rather better packaged those separate strands to present a coherent whole. However, the Bill is essentially a continuation of what has gone before. That is emphasised by the fact that my right hon. Friends the Members for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) and for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) are co-sponsors of the Bill.

The Government's national strategy for carers makes a welcome statement about recognising and supporting carers, and identifying the needs of carers as distinct from the needs of those cared for. Balance is essential. We must find a way to support carers without eroding the essentially voluntary nature of what they do, which is rooted in obligations of love and duty. Those are important, if unfashionable sentiments.

The hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) commented on the speed—or lack of it—with which the need for separate services for carers had been acknowledged. I have discussed that with my right hon. Friends the Members for South-West Surrey and for Charnwood. The answer may have something to do with Government's anxiety to develop a system of supporting carers without undermining the essentially voluntary nature of what they do. I am happy to acknowledge that the Government are sensitive to the voluntary nature of caring. Their national strategy does not try to bureaucratise the sector, but supports voluntaryism. On that basis, we are happy to support the Government.

At the risk of undermining the consensus that often breaks out in Friday debates, it jars slightly that a measure which is central to the Government's strategy for carers is presented as a private Member's Bill. The Prime Minister has protested the importance that the Government place on carers' needs. Without the Bill, there would be a gaping hole in the national strategy for carers. While it is to the credit of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde that he has promoted the Bill, it reflects no credit on the Government that they were unable to find Government time in which to introduce the Bill. It is purely by chance that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde stepped into the breach. Without him, legislation would not reach the statute book so quickly.

Mrs. Heal: The hon. Gentleman claims that it is to the Government's discredit that the subject has been left to a private Member's Bill. Does he agree that it was to the discredit of the previous Government, who were in office for 18 years, that they did not even develop a national strategy for carers?

Mr. Hammond: I shall attempt to show that the strategy for carers has been developing over the past 20 years. The Government have rightly made great play of the emphasis that they place on dealing with carers' needs. On reflection, perhaps the hon. Lady will agree that it is disappointing that such a Bill was not introduced in Government time.

There is a broad base of support for the Bill and the Government's strategy for carers. We shall not be entirely uncritical, and I shall focus especially on resources and expectations. I do not belittle the Government's actions, but in the third year of their three-year programme of ring-fenced grants, the additional money available to provide respite care is £70 million. There are 6 million carers in total, 1.5 million provide more than 20 hours of care a week, and almost 1 million provide more than 50 hours of care a week. It is important to keep expectations in check, because elementary arithmetic makes it clear that relatively small amounts of money will be available per carer for additional services. I am in no way belittling what has been done, but it is important that we do not let the rhetoric run away with us.

There has been a lack of recognition of family and informal care from the inception of the modern welfare state, in marked contrast with other European countries where the obligations of family care are enshrined in law. Many hon. Members would find some examples quite oppressive if they applied here. However, over the past 20 years there has been growing awareness and recognition of the needs and the role of carers. That has been reflected in Government publications and legislation, although I readily acknowledge that until recently the focus was clearly on the cared for with the carer an ancillary part of the equation.

The 1981 White Paper, "Growing Older", was the first Government publication explicitly to recognise the concept of the carer and the problems that carers face. In 1988, the Griffiths report—the precursor to the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990—acknowledged that family, friends, neighbours and the community provided the great bulk of care and that that would continue into the future. It set out the principle that public provision should support and strengthen that voluntary care, not replace it. The guidance for the 1990 Act specifically recognised the need to take account of the preferences and needs of carers. The 1989 White Paper, "Caring for People", set out six objectives, of which one was ensuring that service providers offered practical support for carers.

In 1985, 1990 and 1995, the previous Government commissioned special surveys as part of the general household survey to establish the exact extent of the provision of informal care. Every speaker has recognised that provision is crucial to the debate. The trend of recognising carers continued with the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 and the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, which explicitly recognised the role of carers and gave a right to assessment of the carer's ability to care, although always in the context of the cared-for person.

Mr. Burstow: The 1995 Act was introduced as a private Member's Bill. What additional funds were earmarked by the Conservative Government to enable the legislation to be implemented?

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. The then Government suggested that additional funds would not be required and that those matters could be dealt with by existing local authority allocations. He will find precisely the same wording in the explanatory memorandum for the Bill, which has been prepared by the Department of Health.

To bring us up to date, the new Government—to their credit—have rightly recognised the role of carers and the evolution of that recognition over the past 20 years. I hope that the Minister will not pretend that all that began on 1 May 1997. The Government have set out the key elements of their strategy for carers. Some are already being dealt with by other legislation or regulation, some remain to be dealt with and two are dealt with by the Bill: the provision of respite care, for which a ring-fenced grant has already been announced and implemented, and legislation to enable local authorities to address the needs of carers directly.

It is common sense that we should be able to address the needs of carers directly where that represents the least costly and most effective way of meeting the objective of ensuring the proper continuation of informal care for a person who needs it. The dual objectives of the Bill and the strategy are to support carers in carrying out their caring more efficiently and effectively and to maintain their health and well-being to ensure that they do not, in turn, need care.

We broadly support the Bill, but I have many questions and observations, some of which could be dealt with by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and others which could more appropriately be dealt with by the Minister. Clause 1 is rightly directed at informal carers only. It enshrines the right of a carer to have their own assessment. That is important, because across our social service system the assessment provides the gateway to resources and services. The Bill says only that "the local authority must carry out such an assessment if it is satisfied that the person cared for is someone for whom it may provide or arrange for the provision of community care services."

The Bill envisages a situation in which the cared-for person has refused an assessment. How will it be possible for a local authority to decide whether the person cared for is someone for whom it may provide services under the appropriate legislation without carrying out an assessment? There will inevitably be an assessment of the cared-for person, maybe at arm's length, even against their express wishes. The Minister should consider how that will work.

Clause 1(4) and (5) give the Secretary of State power of directions, but within those directions there will be local discretion on the form of assessment. Does the Minister envisage the directions substantially constraining that local discretion, perhaps imposing a national assessment tool to ensure uniformity in assessment? It would be useful if he could tell us his current thinking on that.

Clause 2 creates a power for local authorities to provide services and direct payments to carers. As others have pointed out, subsection (1)(c) requires that after the local authority has assessed needs, established that there are some and defined that it could satisfy them, it must decide whether it will provide such services. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde suggested that that would simply be a question of a local authority deciding whether it was preferable to provide the services to the carer or to the person cared for. Because of the resource constraints, local authorities will have to decide whether they can afford to provide care at all. We need to ask on what basis local authorities will ration the available care. Local authority social services departments are under tremendous financial pressure. The Government have introduced a ring-fenced grant for respite care, but other services that local authorities have historically provided are being squeezed by other priorities and by the Government's focus—appropriate though it is—on education.

There will be a limited amount of money available to a local authority for providing services under clause 2. There must be a real danger that as different authorities adopt different approaches to prioritisation we shall drop into a system of postcode care. Individuals with similar needs may find that they receive very different treatment from one authority to another. I know from Ministers' comments about the national health service that they are anxious to avoid that. I would be interested to hear how the Minister plans to prevent such differences occurring in the provision of care by local authorities under clause 2 of the Bill.

There will be a great danger of bitter disappointment following the general feeling of goodwill surrounding the Bill if people discover that the help that they thought they would get as a result of the Bill is no longer available due to financial constraints.

I have a specific question for the Minister in relation to clause 2(3)(b) which relates to the provision of intimate care. In response to my intervention, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde expressed the view that clause 2 would permit the provision of care by an outside carer against the wishes of the person being cared for. I find that somewhat disturbing and I would be grateful if the Minister would clarify the position.

I can see the argument for limiting the provision of intimate care in terms of the protection of the person being cared for, but as I said earlier in an intervention on the speech by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), I cannot see how realistic respite care can be provided if it does not include intimate care. It might allow for the odd break of an hour or two for shopping, but clearly it would not allow the carer to go away for a weekend or longer. The provision clearly requires clarification.

Clause 3 takes further the idea of providing respite care, which is extremely important to carers, by giving powers to the Secretary of State to introduce a voucher system. I believe that it is an excellent idea to create a currency that would empower people. Many right hon. and hon. Members have used the term "empowerment" this morning. Vouchers have the benefit of flexibility. Indeed, if this were not a private Member's Bill and today was not a Friday, I might be tempted to trawl through old copies of Hansard to find out what Ministers and Labour Back Benchers have said in the past about the concept of vouchers. However, I am always delighted to witness Ministers, policy makers and Government Back Benchers on the road to Damascus.

Clause 3(3)(a) allows vouchers to be expressed in terms of money or service time. Perhaps the Minister could let us know whether his current thinking is that vouchers will be expressed in terms of service time or money. If they are to be expressed in terms of money, that will raise the vexed question of whether topping up the value of the voucher will be allowed. As, by virtue of clause 7, the vouchers or cash payments will be means tested according to the means of the carer, will the vouchers be issued in a way that makes them personal to the carer, or will they be transferable so that carers will be able to exchange vouchers? Will they be tradeable, so that someone who has been assessed as needing a break and given a voucher will be able to exchange that voucher for money? I would be grateful if the Minister would clarify that.

The vouchers may be issued either to the carer or to the cared-for person, but the Bill is silent as to how that dilemma will be resolved. There is considerable potential for conflict between carers and the cared-for person because the vouchers are currency, and they give power—the power of decision-making to the person in receipt of them. This will not be an issue in most cases, but at the margin hard decisions will have to be made. How does the Minister expect those decisions to be taken?

Clause 3(3)(d) specifies that there will be a maximum period during which the voucher is valid. Can the Minister confirm that this will not be a period limited to the issuing authority's financial year, but that authorities will be able to carry over some of money from the ring-fenced grant from one year to the next to represent the uncashed value of open vouchers? That will be important if people wish to have full flexibility in planning their use of the vouchers.

Clause 6 deals with direct payments or vouchers to parents of disabled children and to disabled children aged 16 and 17. Will the Minister confirm that where direct payments are made to the parents of disabled children, those will always be non-taxable? Will he consider and give guidance on the circumstances in which he expects direct payments to 16 and 17-year-olds to be made?

Hon. Members have emphasised the virtue of such a proposal in terms of the additional independence that it will give to those young people. However, I must voice concerns. These people are children under the age of full adulthood. The measure may create considerable tensions in the parent-child relationship and may undermine parental responsibility. In terms of further and higher education, the benefits are clear, but can the Minister tell us how he hopes this will be dealt with by local authorities without undermining the parental responsibility of those looking after disabled children?

I did not think earlier that I would have to constrain my remarks because of time, but events have taken a different turn. I ask the Minister to confirm that clause 7, which applies the charging mechanism, also applies the means-test which operates in other social services provision.

On clause 9, what is the Government's assessment of additional demand that will be created by the provisions of the Bill? The explanatory memorandum suggests that there will be no additional financial implications. Frankly, I find that difficult to believe. As the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) said, if there are no financial implications of the Bill, it will not have succeeded in its purpose.

Overall, we feel that the Bill is an important contribution in terms of taking the agenda of carers and their needs forward. We believe that there are some dangers which I have sought to highlight and which we can deal with adequately in Committee. We will enter the Committee in a constructive mood, seeking to engage with the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and with the Government in resolving some of those questions to ensure that when the Bill reaches the statute book, it is a robust, durable and effective measure.

2.4 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): We have had a well-informed and constructive debate on an important piece of legislation. In the House, as elsewhere, there is no substitute for common sense gained from practical front-line experience. We have heard from several hon. Members who have that experience in substantial measure: in particular, my hon. Friends the Members for Halesowen and Rowley Regis (Mrs. Heal), for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) and for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner), and my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke).

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Rowley Regis said that it is possible to make a strong moral, social and economic case for the Bill. I agree strongly on all three factors. It is perfectly possible to quantify the benefits in financial terms, but not in human terms. We cannot quantify the practical difference that the Bill can make to the lives of both carers and cared for.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has done the House a huge service, and I warmly congratulate him. He described the Bill as a stunning victory for carers. He was entirely accurate. This is a breakthrough, and I hope that it is the beginning of a new culture and a new approach in social services and other agencies and that the important contribution of carers will be more properly recognised.

Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) said about the history of the evolution of social care policy, we have made a significant difference in the past two or three years. It is important to consolidate and develop that change and to take the next steps forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde made the point well that this is not the end of the story. We could usefully describe the Bill as the turning of a new page in that story. There is much still to do in ensuring that we continue to sustain the momentum that the Bill has created. There is no doubt that it is a landmark piece of legislation. We all have a responsibility to maintain that progress into the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn) made an excellent speech, not only drawing on his own experience but asking the important question about who will care for the carers. From what everyone has said, there is no doubt that the answer is that we must assume the primary responsibility in the legislative framework and in the resources that we allocate to agencies to ensure that they can provide that service.

I agree with the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge that we must strike the right balance, assuming the appropriate range of responsibilities in the public, voluntary and independent sectors while allowing the family to make the appropriate contribution. We want to reflect that in the legislation that we develop, and the Bill certainly achieves that. We have a responsibility as a society to care for the carers, and the Bill is an important reflection of that.

I have only a short time to respond to 15 Back-Bench speeches and offer my own thoughts on the Bill, so I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not refer in great detail to their speeches. I will try to refer briefly to some of the points that have been made.

The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) asked about parent carers. I think that there has been a genuine misunderstanding about the Bill's implications for parent carers, and I hope soon to dispel that. It has always been our intention to consult widely, involving all the interested parties, on guidance and regulations under the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston and my hon. Friend the Member for Hall Green referred in their excellent contributions to the important changes that the Bill will introduce into the direct payments legislation. The Government have no doubt about the importance of direct payments in promoting choice, flexibility and independence. The direct payments scheme, properly operated by local authorities, will have the effect of transferring power from institutions to individuals, and that is entirely consistent with the points that all hon. Members have made in the debate about the importance of empowering individuals, be they carers or people with a disability, to exert greater control and flexibility over the decisions that affect their lives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hall Green spoke from his considerable experience as a social worker about some of the inflexibilities that are an almost inevitable feature of large public sector organisations. Not for the first time, I hear the criticism he has made, but the challenge of direct payments for local authorities is to ensure that when services are provided directly by local authorities they are as flexible and as tailored to the needs of service users as those provided through direct payments. That is a big challenge, but it is the future and local authorities must put themselves in a position to achieve it.

The Bill will introduce some significant changes to the direct payments framework—I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde specifically on that—which will encourage greater choice, control and flexibility in the provision of services. That is much to the good.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) raised several interesting questions. I reassure him that the Bill will not compromise or undermine the relationship between carers and those being cared for. Several hon. Members have pointed out, and I accept, that the Bill covers some complex areas and raises some problems, especially in relation to services of an intimate and personal nature. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge also expressed his views on that point.

I do not pretend that there is an easy solution, but we intend—once the Bill is enacted—to consult as widely as possible on how we can make the necessary regulations effective. It is appropriate to resolve the problems through regulations, instead of locking us into a fixed formula in the Bill that might be difficult to change in future years. My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has tried hard to get the balance right in his Bill, and we support the current drafting because it has succeeded in doing just that.

Mr. Burstow: When the Bill is in Committee, will it be possible to have early drafts of those definitions?

Mr. Hutton: As always, we will do our best to support the work of the Committee, but I cannot give any absolute assurances.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam expressed concerns about whether under clause 2(3) of the Bill the income or assets of the carer, or of the cared-for person, would be taken into account when assessing liability for charging. The answer is in clause 4(4), which makes it clear that that decision will be made by the local authority providing the services. I suspect that we will also need to issue guidance on that point, so that the clause is interpreted consistently.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) made a strong case, as did others, for more resources for local authority social services departments. I am not clear whether he has spoken to the new shadow Chancellor, but perhaps we can look forward to some more policy U-turns. It is refreshing to hear Conservative Members raise those issues, but it must be said that it has taken them some time to get to that position. I recall that in the previous Parliament there was a deafening silence from the Conservatives on such issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) who, sadly, is no longer in his place, was right to say that the Bill is part of a wider strategy. I, too, am sure that there is more that we need to do.

May I correct a mistake made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kemptown when he was describing the allocation of the carers' grant to his local authority? He quoted this year's figure of £128,000, when Brighton and Hove council will receive £313,000 next year.

Mr. Maclean: I am very grateful to the Minister for giving way in his customary courteous manner. He will be aware that the Carers National Association, Mencap and the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation have some small concerns about certain parts of the Bill. Although I generally support the Bill and wish it well, I hope that the Minister will have as open a mind as possible in Committee or perhaps on Report so that we can explore the individual concerns and amendments in due course. The Minister may then be minded to accept some of them, which may reassure those of us who have read carefully the briefings of Mencap, RADAR and the Carers National Association.

Mr. Hutton: The Government certainly have an open mind about these issues, as we display when they come before the House. But this is a private Member's Bill—my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has control of it, while we express our views. However, I assure the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) that we have an open mind about these issues.

It is our view, and I shall not pretend otherwise, that the Bill adequately meets all the objectives that we would like it to achieve. There is one issue that has been mentioned in the debate to which I would like to turn my attention. A number of right hon. and hon. Members have expressed concerns about parent carers, and I should like to reassure them that support for parent carers under the Children Act 1989 has been available since the Act was implemented. The Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 already provides parent carers with a right to an assessment of their need. That is of course why we do not need to refer specifically to parent carers in clause 1 to 4. We have examined the issues carefully, and we believe that the Bill is drafted perfectly properly. I reassure hon. Members who voiced their concerns that there has been no oversight; we have looked at the matter very carefully—and I know that my hon. Friend has too—to ensure that the drafting of the Bill is adequate and comprehensive.

Mr. Burstow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hutton: I am afraid not, because I have a lot to deal with.

The Bill will go significantly further than the 1995 Act, which was introduced and piloted through the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks). It will give effect to the Government's carers national strategy commitment by enabling local authority social services departments to supply certain services direct to carers following assessment, either because the user has refused help from the local authority, or because it is more appropriate for the service to be provided direct to the carers to support them in their caring role and to maintain their own health and well-being.

In addition to offering greater support to carers, the Bill offers more opportunities for carers and the people they care for—including parent carers of disabled children, young carers and disabled children aged 16 and 17—to have flexibility in the timing and choice of the way in which services are delivered to meet their assessed needs.

The carers national strategy is aimed at empowering carers to make more choices for themselves and to have more control over their lives. They want their positive contribution to society to be valued and acknowledged. The Bill achieves that by giving local authorities the power to provide services direct to carers to support them in their caring role and by extending direct payments to carers to meet their own assessed needs.

The Community Care (Direct Payments) Act 1996 came into force on 1 April 1997. The Act gives local authorities the power to offer people cash payments as an alternative to providing social care services, so they may purchase the relevant services themselves. The Act was widely welcomed by disabled people. The extension of direct payments to carers to meet their own assessed needs, and to parent carers, has also been welcomed by carers organisations and voluntary organisations for children.

Direct payments offer more choice and flexibility in the timing of services and the way in which they are delivered, but of course people must use their direct payments to meet their assessed need for social services support.

Some parents will grasp the opportunity of receiving payments instead of services. They may choose to employ a personal assistant for their child instead of receiving a regular series of short-term breaks. Such an assistant could help the disabled youngster to enjoy mainstream leisure facilities or after-school clubs, which would achieve the Government's objective of social inclusion.

Parent carers like to be as independent as possible in making arrangements for the care of their disabled children. The Bill will help them to achieve a far greater level of independence than they have experienced before. However, direct payments for parent carers raise various questions, including promoting the welfare of the disabled child, which need to be carefully considered, as the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam said.

Direct payments will be provided within the framework of part III of the Children Act 1989, which requires that local authorities provide a range of services to promote and safeguard the welfare of children. By amending the Children Act, the Bill will ensure that the legislative framework to promote and safeguard the welfare of children will still apply when parents choose the option of direct payments. Local authorities will have to review direct payments as the needs of children and families change over time, just as they do when families receive services directly from the local authority.

There is also the consideration that children could be put at risk if parents used their direct payment to engage unsuitable people to help them care for their child. That is an issue for both parent carers of disabled children and disabled parents seeking people to support them in their parenting role. The Department of Health will help parents to take the steps necessary to satisfy themselves that a person offering to help with the care of their child is a suitable person. In addition, the Government intend to legislate to ensure that local authorities have the power to undertake criminal record checks on behalf of parents—if the parent wishes it—as soon as possible.

The extension of direct payments to 16 and 17-year-old disabled children and young people will offer them additional flexibility to meet their own developmental needs. The extension of direct payments to that group of young people follows strong representations to the Government's recent review of direct payments from groups, such as RADAR, that represent disabled young people.

Particular issues also surround the power to make direct payments to 16 and 17-year-old young carers. The Government do not want to burden any children with inappropriate caring responsibilities. Local authorities will offer direct payments to 16 and 17-year-old young carers only after giving full consideration to the interests of the child.

I stress that advocacy and support will be important to young people who are thinking about or receiving direct payments. The concept of independent advocacy is familiar to local authority social services departments. Advocacy and support services relevant to direct payment schemes already exist in the many authorities with good direct payment schemes. These may need to be adapted for young people, but local authorities have experience of the types of services that would be appropriate, and the Government are committed to ensuring that best practice in the use of direct payments is disseminated among all local authorities.

The carers national strategy also identified voucher schemes as a way of giving users and carers more flexibility in the timing and choice of the ways in which additional services were delivered. The Bill will meet the carers national strategy commitment to offer vouchers for short-term breaks. After an assessment of a carer or parent carer results in a decision that the carer needs breaks from caring responsibilities, the cared-for person will be assessed for the type of additional support that he or she needs if the carer is to take a break. Vouchers may be exchanged—at the time of choosing of the carer or cared-for person—for the services the user has been assessed as needing while the carer takes a break.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge asked me about 20 specific questions about the Bill. We shall try to address those issues in Committee. In particular, the hon. Gentleman asked whether the face of the vouchers would show a money value or an assessment of service need. The Bill addresses that point, as he will find if he reads it carefully.

Mr. Hammond: It could be either.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. The Bill says that it could be either. However, he asked whether the value could be expressed as either, and the obvious answer is yes.

In relation to the implementation of the measure, we intend to issue local authorities with appropriate help in the form of guidance as to the use of the new powers.

The issue of charging and resources was raised constantly. My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and other hon. Members asked me to comment on the Government's position on charging for non-residential care, including services to carers. It is for each local authority to decide whether to make charges for non-residential services and, if so, how much to charge. The existing legislation requires any such charge to be reasonable—that is the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore). Our view is that it is reasonable to recover a charge, if that can be done without causing hardship to the service user.

In our White Paper, "Modernising Social Services", we recognised that the scale of variation in discretionary charges is unacceptable. We are considering the recommendations in the royal commission's report, and we shall consider carefully the Audit Commission's review of local authority charging when it is published in April. We shall then consider how the system could be improved in the light of the royal commission's report and that forthcoming study. We hope to announce our conclusions later this year.

We shall of course work with the voluntary sector—including carers' organisations, such as the Carers National Association, to ensure that users of services and carers can be fully involved in that process of consultation. I shall ensure that the views of carers are fully taken into account—as I think my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde asked me to do.

Our aim is to move as far as possible towards greater consistency and fairness in charging. That commitment includes being fair to carers and to other people who receive community care services. However, we need a consistent approach, not one that might treat one group of people who use those services differently from another.

Resources have been referred to repeatedly. I want to correct one misunderstanding. There have been many references to the carers special grant—the £140 million of new resources over the three years of the spending review. The point has been well made by some hon. Members that that is only part of the resources package available to local authorities to support carers and to provide respite services. It is on top of the substantial increases in social services spending that are currently under way.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam is always talking about reductions in spending in social services departments. The Government are raising spending on social services by almost £500 million this year. In addition to that general lift in the resources package, there are the specific grants to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston referred to—£750 million of new partnership money and £375 million of children's special grant. Those amounts form part of the wider resource envelope against which we should judge the Government's record on resourcing carers' services.

I do not speak in a partisan sense—this is not the time to do that, although it may be the place—when I point out that the Government are taking a significant step forward in the way in which we are resourcing social services and social care. That is reflected by the £2.8 billion increase in social services over this spending round and by the additional grants that we are making.

The Government value carers and will continue to support them in their caring role. We strongly support the measures in the Bill. The Bill helps carers by empowering them to make more choices for themselves and to have more control over their lives.

Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde on promoting the Bill. It is an important step forward, both for carers and for people with disabilities. I hope that the House will give it the strongest possible support.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills).

Export of Farm Animals Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.29 pm

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

More than 20,000 sheep packed into lorries pass through my constituency every week. Each truck carries the potential for great suffering. My constituents have put up with that for many years. However, I do not come to this vexed subject just as the Member of Parliament for Dover, but as an ex-seafarer who has witnessed the awful abuse associated with live animal exports close up in the blistering heat of the Arabian gulf and the storm-torn seas of the English channel and the Irish sea. The trade inflicts great suffering on living creatures and has no legitimate part to play in a civilised caring society. My Bill would ban the export of live animals—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 7 April.

That, in respect of the Northern Ireland Bill, notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Pope.]

COMMITTEES

Motion made, and Question put,

ENVIRONMENTAL AUDIT

That Norman Baker be discharged from the Environmental Audit Committee and Mr. Paul Keetch be added to the Committee.

BROADCASTING

That Mr. Andrew Stunell be discharged from the Broadcasting Committee and Norman Baker be added to the Committee.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I put motions 7 and 8 together. May I clarify whether objections were made to both motions?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is exempted business. Therefore we cannot proceed with it.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask you to confirm that you have had no request from the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to come to the House to make a statement in the light of disastrous attendance figures for the dome that have been revealed this morning—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have received no indication that such a statement might be made today.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is most unfortunate that two important animal welfare Bills did not see the light of day today. My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) had 30 seconds in which to speak on his Bill and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows well how the House works and we have followed its normal procedures.

Wheel Clamping

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

2.32 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): May I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to raise in an Adjournment debate the issue of wheel clamping on private land?

First, I wish to make absolutely clear my support for the right of landowners to protect their land from unauthorised parking. They often have commercial or other interests that can be adversely affected by unauthorised parking. In the case of hospitals, doctors' surgeries and so on, unauthorised parking may well constitute a serious risk to the public.

It is unreasonable to expect landowners to have to use the courts to sue for trespass when dealing with the problem. They should have the ability to control parking, but equally the public must be protected from an industry that has more cowboys than a John Wayne western.

Hon. Members may think that Harrogate is one of the last places where a war on clamping should be waged. Let me assure the House that any individual with a mobile phone, a strong arm, a menacing look and £50 for his first clamp can operate anywhere and take a slice of this estimated £150 million business.

Imagine the scene: two senior citizens set off for an evening at Harrogate theatre. The weather was bad, so they parked close to the theatre in private space owned by a friend and colleague. The performance of "Don Giovanni" was superb, but the evening was somewhat spoiled by the shock of their returning to their car only to find that it had disappeared.

A notice on an adjoining property referred to National Parking Controls—NPC—and a mobile phone number. The senior citizens rang but, alas, their car was already on a journey to Leeds some 20 miles away. It could be returned to Harrogate provided that the sum of £75 for clamping and £190 for towing—a total of £265—could be produced within the hour. With help from their friends, the money was obtained and, miraculously, after it was paid over, the car was on its way not to Leeds, but to a local council car park where the clampers and their two tow trucks were parked. NPC, it seems, uses a public car park without authority to park the cars that it clamps for being parked illegally. That is rather like a scene from "Trigger Happy TV" with Dom Joly.

That is not an unusual story. NPC has been operating in Harrogate for some months. It usually pounces at night and the number of cases continues to escalate. Despite a vigorous campaign by the Harrogate Advertiser and the local council, NPC continues to mine a rich vein.

Such tales are not uncommon elsewhere in England. Clampers in Doncaster threatened to hold to ransom a three-year-old girl until her mother collected £60 from the bank. Clampers on scrap land in Sheffield demanded a female motorist's gold tooth as payment. A hearse with a body in the back was clamped outside a church. Clampers demanded sex from a young woman who was unable to pay a fine late at night. Two weeks ago, a paramedic vehicle was clamped while attending an incident in Lancaster.

The system of extortion, intimidation and blackmail by unregulated clampers can seemingly go ahead unchallenged by the current law. That is not so in Scotland, where in 1992 the Lord Justice General said that "an activity as sensitive to abuse as wheel clamping requires careful regulation under law".

He judged wheel clamping on private land to be extortion and theft. As a result, pirate clamping is now outlawed in Scotland; the industry is properly regulated and full protection is afforded to landowners and motorists.

In England, no such regulation exists. Indeed, a Court of Appeal judgment in the case of Arthur and another v. Anker on 30 November 1995 made it clear that wheel clamping of a vehicle without authority on private land and its release only on payment of a fee was neither tortious nor criminal, provided that the motorist had seen, and therefore consented to, the conditions on clamping displayed on an appropriate sign and that the release fee was reasonable, easily payable and resulted in prompt release.

That judgment, unlike the judgment in Scotland, merely muddied the waters. What constitutes an adequately displayed notice? What is a reasonable fee? How is it possible easily to pay the charge late at night? In my view, a charge of £265 to regain one's car is unreasonable and extortionate, and to demand the money, often with menace, constitutes blackmail as defined in section 21 of the Theft Act 1968. The police, however, are reluctant to become involved, and there are few occasions when the Crown Prosecution Service has prosecuted a clamper for behaviour that in other walks of life would warrant arrest.

At present, the only recourse for an individual is to pursue a civil court action. One of my constituents did just that. She argued that the clampers' signs were too small. NPC was then ordered to pay back the £190 towing fee plus legal costs of £130. Needless to say, five weeks later, NPC has not paid a penny.

The answer, however, is not to encourage a host of individuals to take civil action but to legislate to deal with the problem once and for all. Statutory regulations must be introduced quickly. Clamping companies must be registered, and if they operate without a licence they should face criminal prosecution. Fines, including on-the-spot release fees and towing and storage charges, should be standardised and brought into line with existing fines for on-street clamping.

The size, number and format of warning signs should be standardised. Motorists should be free to pay by cash, cheque or credit card, and be given a reasonable period in which to find the money. Cars should be towed away only if they are to be stored in a secure compound, and the address given to the motorist involved. There should be an appeals procedure and clamping companies should be able to operate only where the landowner is registered and licensed.

What is surprising is that everyone—including, I am sure, the Minister—agrees, particularly responsible private security firms. It is not a party political issue; it is one of commitment. In 1992, the Conservative Home Office Minister, the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), promised to look into pirate clamping. In a letter to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), he said:

"Urgent consideration is now being given by the Government to this issue".

In February 1993, the Home Office produced a consultation paper called "Wheelclamping on private land", but no action followed.

In July 1996, the Regulation of the Wheelclamping Industry Bill was presented as a private Member's Bill by my noble Friend Baroness Maddock, supported by the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), who was a Transport Minister in the present Government. On 26 August 1996, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), now the Home Secretary, took up the cause in a press release entitled "Labour to clamp down on cowboy wheelclampers". The press release states:

"Across the country, innocent motorists—including many women—have been tyrannised by cowboy wheelclampers who charge extortionate fees and at present operate effectively outside the law."

In government, the Home Secretary appeared equally committed. On 15 July 1997, speaking to the British Security Industry Association, he promised

"A crackdown on clampers and cowboys", adding that

"Proposals for regulating wheelclamping must be simple and effective."

Two and a half years later, there is no legislation. We have had yet more consultation and another White Paper, "The Government's Proposals for Regulation of the Private Security Industry in England and Wales", which was published nearly a year ago. The White Paper is quite specific about wheel clamping, stating in paragraph 5.11:

"The operation of wheelclamping firms could be dealt with by the use of statutory regulations/codes of practice recommended by the Authority."

That refers to the Government's main proposal, which is to set up a private security authority to regulate all the activities of private sector security firms, including clampers. I fail to understand why the Government have chosen that route; perhaps the Minister will explain.

Given the urgency of the problem, which has been admitted by the Home Secretary both before and after Labour entered office, will the Minister explain why the Government have chosen to create yet another new authority? Why not amend the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 to cover wheel clamping? That would be a simple procedure. Why not legislate within the new Transport Bill, using local authorities as the regulatory bodies? That was clearly an option when the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions introduced the transport White Paper; it remains an option, because that Bill is still in Committee.

Have the Government considered using other existing legislation covering local government miscellaneous provisions to give statutory powers to new regulations? I ask that because it is to the local authority, or local police, that disgruntled motorists go when they have problems. Motorists and landowners are familiar with those bodies: they already see them enforcing parking controls, so an extension of local authority functions rather than the creation of a new body would appear logical.

Given that the Government appear determined to crack this nut with an extremely large hammer, will the Minister give a date when the private security authority Bill will be put before the House? If not, will he confirm that, despite his commitment to the hon. Members for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) and for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) on 17 January, at columns 550-51 in Hansard, there is absolutely no chance of legislation being introduced within the lifetime of this Parliament? If so, will he accept a private Member's Bill on the subject?

Despite all the promises of the past seven years, my constituents and those of many right hon. and hon. Members will continue to suffer at the hands of these modern-day highwaymen. Furthermore, landowners, who have a right to safeguard their land, will continue to be castigated as rogues for so doing. The Government have conceded that there is a problem; the public want a solution, as does the legitimate industry. The solution is relatively straightforward. The question is, when will the Government act?

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Paul Boateng): I thank the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) for raising this issue. It is one with which I am sure many of our constituents will have ready empathy. We recognise the strength of feeling of those who have suffered being clamped. I am only too aware of the disreputable way in which some—but by no means all—clampers go about their business. It is bad enough that they clamp people's cars without there being any warning signs and charge outrageous release fees, but there are even cases in which drivers have been threatened with violence. That is totally unacceptable.

Having said that, everyone has to respect the property of others, and there are those who will not do that. Owners of land must be able to take action against those who park on it without their permission; in my view and that of many others, wheel clamping—or at least the threat of it—can be an effective means of dealing with irresponsible parking. However, wheel clamping must be carried out in a reasonable manner. I stress the word "reasonable". There must be warning signs of a reasonable size, and the release fee must not be extortionate. There must certainly be no threat of violence attached to seeking the release fee.

To some extent, as the hon. Gentleman recognised, case law has already enshrined those principles—differently north and south of the border, as is to be expected in different jurisdictions. In 1995, in the case of Arthur and Arthur v. Anker, the Court of Appeal adjudged that clampers had acted legally, as adequate warning signs had been displayed, the release fee was reasonable, and there was a reasonable method of payment.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal provided useful guidelines to courts faced with similar cases, but only in broad terms. It did not define a general standard for the size of signs, or what a "reasonable" release fee might be. That leaves the motorist who is aggrieved by having his or her car clamped on private land with only limited practical means of redress. Unless the behaviour of the clamper is quite outrageous, the motorist may well be uncertain of his or her rights, and may be dissuaded from going to court by the potential cost of legal fees.

The industry is poorly regulated. We recognised that when we published the White Paper "The Government's Proposals for Regulation of the Private Security Industry in England and Wales" last year. I was responsible for the publication of that document, and central to it was our recognition of the need to ensure that it would no longer be possible for anyone with a van and a clamp to set up as a wheel clamper.

[Mr. Paul Boateng]

All that clampers have to do is tell the landowner that they will, for a given fee, clamp anyone parked on his or her land. They can then subsequently clamp at will, and the driver has little redress against them or the landowner. That is clearly unacceptable. The aim of our proposals is to protect the public by ensuring basic standards of probity across the private security industry. We are determined to eradicate undesirable elements from the industry, including cowboy wheel clampers.

I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will see some merit in the proposed private security industry authority. It is designed to have a holistic approach to the challenges faced by the private security industry, rather than relying on ad hoc responses, however well founded the sense of grievance that motivates them.

The authority will have as one of its duties the responsibility of licensing individuals in the private security industry, including those involved in wheel clamping. Managers and directors of security companies will also need to hold a licence. That will be a valuable tool at the disposal of the community in ensuring a properly regulated private security industry. It has been welcomed by responsible operators.

It is also proposed that the authority would have the responsibility of producing or endorsing standards and codes of practice for the industry and, where necessary, of making recommendations for statutory regulation. In the case of wheel clamping, the White Paper specifically acknowledged—as the hon. Gentleman recognised—the importance of ensuring that statutory regulations or a code of practice were in place to govern the operation of wheel clamping firms.

We are currently considering how best to take forward the White Paper in the light of considerable interest. We received 180 responses to the paper. I undertake to the hon. Gentleman that we will shortly make known our conclusions.

We have made clear our intention to introduce legislation to regulate the private security industry as soon as parliamentary time allows. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced parliamentarian, and he knows that I cannot tell him exactly when the legislation will be introduced. However, I stress that the Home Office is completely committed to it. It has to compete with several other important and necessary measures which have been urged on us. We are determined to crack down on the unsavoury activities of some of those involved in wheel clamping.

The cases that the hon. Gentleman outlined this afternoon give an accurate flavour of what our fellow citizens have to endure. A night at the opera, especially an opera as uplifting as "Don Giovanni", should not be ruined by such an unpleasant event. I hope that the fate of the wheel clampers will mirror that of Don Giovanni in the last act. Perhaps that is an uncharitable sentiment, but it is entirely justified in the light of the experiences of the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

We look to the private security industry authority to develop the codes of practice. We want the codes to take account of those that already operate successfully in the industry. We have therefore an opportunity to put in place a voluntary code of practice with the industry. Considerable progress is being made on that. It will address some of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, for example, standardising fines, ensuring a range of options—cash, cheque, credit card, Switch—for payment, and a proper appeals procedure.

The British Parking Association is co-operating with the Government to produce a draft code of practice, which it intends to circulate for comment shortly. The consultation will extend to motorist and parking organisations so that the final draft represents the interests of both groups.

I warmly welcome the initiative to find practical measures now, which the responsible majority of clamping operators support. We can thus ensure that the interests of the owners of private land are protected by an effective, proportionate and professional service that deals with unauthorised parking, that the harm and damage perpetrated by cowboys is exposed, and that the full weight of public opinion is brought to bear against them.

That is only a beginning, and we look towards a regulatory authority, a system of licensing and sanctions, which will build on the code of practice. Irresponsible and fraudulent wheel clamping will thus become a thing of the past.

The debate, albeit short, at the instigation of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough is a welcome step forward towards that conclusion, which cannot come soon enough.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes to Three o'clock.

European Asylum Seekers

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

9.30 am

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss a subject that is highly topical at the present time. Indeed, when I asked questions in the Council of Europe last September about the matter, I did not realise how topical it would become. Hon. Members will have seen the figures published in the press this weekend, which show that the number of people seeking asylum in this country has increased by 50 per cent. or more over the past year.

Since coming to power, Labour has repeatedly announced measures to reduce the number of asylum applications made in the United Kingdom, but, after nearly three years of Labour government, the number of applications has reached an all-time high. During October, a spate of headlines appeared in the national press. One stated: "Immigrants enter Britain 'sewn into sides of trains'".

"Bogus asylum-seekers are being sewn into the canvas sides of Channel Tunnel freight trains and smuggled into Britain by Italian gangsters."

That appeared on 3 October. The following day, another headline appeared: "Gipsy immigrants taking cheap flights to Britain".

According to the article:

"Gipsy immigrants are taking cheap flights to Britain as part of a big rise in asylum seekers from Eastern Europe, says the Home Office."

Later that month, the headline appeared: "Record numbers seeking asylum". The article explained:

"Record numbers of refugees are seeking asylum in Britain, the Home Office said yesterday."

At the end of that month, another headline appeared: "Czech gipsies threaten exodus". According to the report:

"A wave of gipsies will head for Britain and other European Union countries seeking political asylum".

The statistics that the Government published just before Christmas show that in 1996, under the Conservative Government, the number of asylum seekers from Europe totalled 6,475. The following year, part of which was under the new Labour Administration, the number had risen to 9,145—by almost 50 per cent. By 1998, that figure had almost doubled again, to 17,745. The reports in this weekend's press, to which I alluded a moment ago, suggest that the total number of asylum seekers from the entire world—the figures that I gave previously related to Europe—in 1999 is estimated to be 89,700, which is 50 per cent. more than the 58,000 announced for 1998.

That vast increase in the number of asylum seekers places unreasonable demands on social services, police and other departments and creates unsustainable pressures on communities at the major ports of entry and the surrounding areas. The behaviour of some migrants is unacceptable. Hon. Members will be conscious of the number of people begging on the London Underground and importuning passers-by in the street. Not least of my anxieties is the cost to society in general at a time when Government funding to police, health and local authorities is totally inadequate to satisfy the legitimate demands of the indigenous population. In my home county of Shropshire, we are aggrieved because the money that we receive is quite inadequate for the services that our local authorities, health authorities and police authorities have to provide.

I emphasise that the debate that I have initiated relates only to asylum seekers from Europe. It has such a specific focus because there is an easy, cost-free solution to the issue of European asylum seekers. Some 41 countries now belong to the Council of Europe, membership of which is conditional on the acceptance of the European convention on human rights. In other words, no country can join the Council of Europe without first agreeing to comply with the conditions of the convention.

I should explain that the Council of Europe began with a congregation of western European nations in 1949 to ensure that as far as possible, there was never again such a flagrant abuse of human rights as had occurred in the second world war. On 4 November 1950 in Rome, the European convention on human rights and the European Court of Human Rights—not to be confused with the European Court of Justice—were set up under the auspices of the Council of Europe which to this day is vitally involved in all matters relating to human rights.

It therefore follows that the human rights of any national of any one of the 41 countries with membership of the Council of Europe is protected by the European convention and, by default, that individuals or groups of individuals can and should seek redress through the European Court of Human Rights. The fact that many thousands of people from countries such as Albania, the Czech Republic, Poland, the Slovak Republic, Turkey, the former USSR and the former Yugoslavia choose not to do so is the reason that I have initiated today's debate. Coincidentally, this afternoon the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg will debate restrictions on asylum in the member states of the Council of Europe and the European Union. I very much hope that my parliamentary colleagues will pursue the motion for a resolution that I sponsored in this forum last September. The text of my motion states:

"The Assembly:

i. Recognising that membership of the Council of Europe is conditional upon acceptance of the European Convention on Human Rights;

ii. Given that the human rights of all citizens of Council of Europe member states are protected by the right of individual petition to the Court of Human Rights whose findings are obliged to be responded to by Governments;

[Mr. Christopher Gill]

iii. Given that all 41 member states of the Council of Europe have pledged to support the principle of human rights within their own borders;

iv. Mindful of the fact that human rights are a fundamental tenet of the constitution of the Council of Europe;

v. Having regard to the not insignificant number of citizens of Council of Europe member states who continue to seek political asylum in other Council of Europe countries;

vi. Conscious of the possibility that some of those seeking political asylum are either economic migrants or fugitives from justice;

1. Believes that the situation in which citizens of member states of the Council of Europe continue to claim political asylum in other Council of Europe countries controverts the fundamental responsibility of member states to respect the European Convention on Human Rights;

2. Calls for the appropriate committee to report on this situation."

The motion was supported by 69 parliamentarians, including 11 members of the United Kingdom Socialist delegation. Signatories come from 24 countries and represent no fewer than four of the five recognised party groupings in the Council of Europe Assembly. I might further add that the signatures were collected in 24 hours. There were signatories not just from delegations from countries in western Europe, but from Turkey and eight central and eastern European countries, including Croatia, Poland and the Slovak Republic.

Right hon. and hon. Members might be interested to hear the response that I obtained from the Council of Europe's chairman-in-office when I asked whether, having regard to the fact that each member country of the Council of Europe is bound by the European convention on human rights, he could explain how citizens of COE member states continue to seek asylum in the United Kingdom, Mr. Asgrimsson replied:

"Let me admit that compliance unfortunately is not uniform".

He went on to say that

"nationals of all member states are of course free to avail themselves of the European Convention on Human Rights."

That is precisely my point. I asked the chairman-in-office a supplementary question:

"Does the Minister accept that, if all Council of Europe member states honour their terms of the European Convention on Human Rights there would be no need for political asylum in Europe, but if individual states do not, or will not, discharge their obligations under the convention, does that not challenge the fundamental raison d'etre of the Assembly? Why should the failure of some member states to honour their commitments impose additional burdens upon those that do? Does he share my concern that, included amongst those seeking political asylum, there are those who are fugitives from justice in their own countries?"

Mr. Asgrimsson replied:

"We are all aware of that situation, but we also know that our countries have different living conditions", which makes my second point—that many of these people are not genuine asylum seekers at all but simply, as many of us have long suspected, economic migrants.

I come now to the Government's record. They published in Cmnd. 4431 the figures to which I referred—proof, if it were needed, that the situation has worsened dramatically since Labour came to power. However, guidance notes issued to the United Kingdom parliamentary delegation to the Council of Europe state that and, to their credit, that

"the UK Government considers it important, however, that member states should be entitled to impose conditions on persons seeking to travel to their territory; detain asylum seekers in appropriate cases; and return asylum seekers to safe third countries without giving substantive considerations to their claims."

In other words, in this area of policy as in so many others, the Government are strong on rhetoric but weak on action, as the figures, published last weekend, prove.

On 21 August last year, I wrote to the Home Secretary stating that,

"in advance of next month's meeting of the Council of Europe, I should be grateful if you would provide me with a synopsis of your Department's policy regarding immigrants and asylum seekers from other parts of the European Continent. My question is prompted by news reports of gypsies from the Czech Republic and other CEE countries seeking asylum in this country . . . maybe you would agree that the question of asylum seekers from any of these countries is a matter of concern which should be raised as a business item in that forum".

Leaving aside the fact that it took the Minister of State five weeks to respond—her reply awaited me on my return from Strasbourg—she said in that belated reply that I had specifically referred to

"the immigration of large numbers of Roma from the Czech Republic and other CEE countries."

That is not so. I specifically referred in my letter of 21 August to gypsies—a description that my constituents in Shropshire, where we call a spade a spade, would readily understand. The Chamber will appreciate that I have not yet converted to political correctness; nor do I intend to.

The Minister also stated in her letter that "the number of asylum seekers from Central Europe has risen sharply in recent months."

That being so, and given that, according to the Minister's letter,

"the vast majority of applicants from Poland, the Czech and Slovak Republics are Roma and those from Croatia are mainly ethnic Serbs" that does not in any way alter the fact that either those countries are in clear breach of their obligations under the European convention or that the migrants themselves are at fault in not having sought redress through the European Court of Human Rights—as is their right—and are probably bogus? Either way, I fail to understand why the problem should be dumped in the lap of the British taxpayer.

In fairness, I should say that in her letter the Minister states that "in the case of Poland, the Czech and Slovak Republics, since January 1998, on initial consideration, all applications for asylum have been refused".

Unfortunately, that assurance is at odds with newspaper reports that appeared last Saturday, which reported the UN High Commissioner for Refugees as estimating the total number of refugees in 1999 at 89,700, compared with 46,000 applications for asylum received in the United Kingdom in 1998. In fairness to the Minister, once again, I concede that the 46,000 becomes 58,000 if dependants are added. Nevertheless, we have a direct comparison of 58,000 in 1998 with 89,700 in 1999—in other words, half as many again as in the previous year. That figure represents asylum seekers from all parts of the world, but it includes a substantial increase in applicants from Europe. Clearly, something is wrong when countries that have entered into solemn and binding agreements do not honour them. From our point of view, their failure to do so becomes a burden on the countries that do honour them.

Before I move on from the Minister's letter, I wish to draw attention to another sentence, which states that "candidate countries of Central and Eastern Europe who wish to joint the European Union must meet the Copenhagen criteria."

I had not asked about the European charter of fundamental rights. Prompted by that gratuitous comment, however, I do so now. Is not the European Union's proposal to establish its own charter of human rights in parallel with, or as an alternative to, the European convention on human rights of a piece with the EU's plans to establish corpus juris as an alternative to national jurisprudence—just as its determination to create its own European defence force as an alternative to NATO and to create the euro as an alternative to national currencies, is the clearest indication that the EU is hellbent on creating the European superstate, which, almost alone in Europe today, British politicians continue to deny?

I appreciate that the issue of asylum seekers is fraught, but it is likely to become even more so unless the Government take tougher action. This matter is important and of great interest to many of our constituents, so why did it take the Home Office five weeks to respond to my letter, effectively preventing me from having the benefit of its advice in time for the Council of Europe meeting in September? Do the Government agree that it is unacceptable for nationals whose countries are signatories to the European convention to seek asylum in other countries?

What steps will the Government take to ensure that all Council of Europe countries honour their obligations under the European convention on human rights? Will the Government take steps to remove the ambiguity—evidenced by the Court of Appeal's judgment of 23 July 1999—regarding the UK's interpretation of the 1951 convention and protocol relating to the status of refugees, as compared with the interpretation of other European countries such as France and Germany? Will the Government recognise that bogus asylum seekers are anathema to the majority of law-abiding British citizens and that the Government have no mandate from the British people to stretch a point beyond that which we are honour bound to accept by dint of our international treaty obligations? Is it reasonable for the British taxpayer to pick up the tab for the failure of other countries to honour their human rights obligations?

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Before my hon. Friend concludes his excellent contribution, may I add two points to his list? Ratepayers and council tax payers in Kent are, this year alone, £4.5 million short in compensation from the centre. Should the European Union consider as candidates countries from which large numbers of people apply for asylum and which are, incidentally, members of the Council of Europe?

Mr. Gill: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. One of the points that I hope will emerge from our debate today is that 41 countries currently belong to the Council of Europe and they have all signed up to the European convention on human rights. Clearly, not all of them are honouring their obligations. My fear is that we will create an alternative body within the EU and a blind eye will be turned to some of the things that go on in those countries. Far from solving the problem, it will simply compound it, and Governments who should act in respect of countries that are in default will not do so but will focus on the new body.

I am pleased to see my hon. Friend in the Chamber this morning because I am very conscious of the fact that counties such as Kent are taking the brunt of the numbers seeking asylum in this country. You may wonder, Mr. Deputy Speaker, why the Member for Ludlow in Shropshire is initiating this debate when, as yet, we are not too burdened with the problem of asylum seekers. The Government's policy is not to take a strong line with other countries and tell them to honour their obligations under the European convention but to say that we must disperse the problem. Tens of thousands of people are coming in, but, rather than take stronger action to cut off the supply, so to speak, the Government are threatening to disperse people to other parts of the country. It will become a problem for me.

Thanks to information received from the Local Government Association only yesterday evening, I became aware that Dudley and Wolverhampton—Wolverhampton is only six miles from my constituency—are scheduled to take some of these people. Instead of solving the problem and sending bogus asylum seekers home, the Government propose to decamp them from Kent to other parts of the country. It will then become a problem for me and other hon. Members who represent parts of the country that are, as yet, unaffected.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Is my hon. Friend aware that the Government are not fulfilling their responsibilities to local authorities, not just on the south coast but throughout the country? Stockport borough council, for instance, is owed hundreds of thousands of pounds from the Government in relation to Kosovar refugees who, quite rightly, were taken into this country. The Government are not honouring their obligations.

Mr. Gill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I cannot claim to be conscious of the detail, although I am aware of the system that is supposed to recompense his and other authorities for shouldering part of the burden. I have every sympathy with him, his constituents and his local council, but the point that I want to stress this morning is that the Government must do far more to stop this flood of asylum seekers—and it has become a flood. As the figures demonstrate, over the past four years the total number of asylum seekers of all nationalities to this country has increased from 30,000 to 32,500 to 58,000 and now to 89,700. That is the problem. I would far rather the Government, instead of indulging in palliatives, dealt with the problem at source. What action will they take to persuade the world that the United Kingdom is not the soft touch that asylum seekers clearly think it is?

[Mr. Gill]

I said at the beginning of my remarks that there was an easy, cost-free solution to the problem of asylum seekers from Europe, and there is. Will the Government now make it plain to the other signatories of the European convention that if we are to stick to our side of the bargain, they must stick to theirs? Do they not recognise that merely absorbing the consequences of other countries' failure to abide by the rules simply makes it easier for those other countries to go on ignoring the rules? It is time for the Government to put their foot down. The question is: will they now do so?

Jackie Ballard (Taunton): There is no point in my rehearsing the reasons why Liberal Democrats opposed the recent Immigration and Asylum Bill, but we strongly support the rights of refugees under international conventions to seek asylum. We also believe that we have a duty to ensure that their claims are dealt with speedily and fairly and that, while they are waiting for their claims to be processed, they should be treated with dignity and respect.

It is to our shame as Europeans that major conflicts in the past few years in Europe have led to an increasing number of people fleeing their countries, leaving behind their families, homes and jobs. Therefore, it is not surprising to me—although it seems to be to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill)—that there are record numbers of asylum seekers. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has been disintegrating and Europe has not seen such numbers of displaced people for 50 years, but the increase is clearly not our Government's fault. Perhaps, instead, we should be proud that people seek refuge in what is still seen as a liberal and tolerant country. There is an international emergency and we as a nation must do our bit, not just under international conventions but morally, to share the burden. This international problem demands an international response and international responsibility.

My party has long argued for a common European framework on asylum, and we were told during the British presidency of the European Union that the Prime Minister intended to make progress on the issue. What progress has been made on establishing such a framework?

I want to take the opportunity of this debate to draw the Minister's attention to some of the problems associated with the dispersal of asylum seekers. I have spoken in the past couple of days to my local councils and I know that local authorities across the country have worked well together to produce an agreed framework.

My area has been designated a cluster area, and I have no complaints about that. There is a duty on the county council to provide care and accommodation for asylum seekers, but there is no duty on the district council, as the housing authority, to provide accommodation. Indeed, if there were, it could not meet it: my local authority has about 10 void properties a month, which does not meet the housing needs of more than 1,000 people on the local waiting list, far less the accommodation needs of asylum seekers. I know that some areas of the country have many voids and are not in the same position as we in the south-west. My county council has a serious problem in finding appropriate accommodation in a short-time, but it will do its best, and hopes not to have to resort to bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Local authorities around the country will have difficulties in caring for and accommodating asylum seekers, and in doing so on the fixed sum allocated by the Government. Health and education costs will not be recoverable. We do not blame asylum seekers for those problems. Having fled repression and intimidation, they should not face a punitive or dehumanising reception on arriving in this country.

What are asylum seekers expected to do while their applications are being processed? It is probably reasonable that they are not allowed to do paid work, but they are not allowed to do voluntary work either. Such work would allow them to spend their time usefully and purposefully by participating willingly in communities in which they have been dispersed. If asylum seekers were to make such contributions, communities would accept them more readily.

The hon. Member for Ludlow said that the Government could solve those problems by sending home bogus asylum seekers rather than dispersing them—

Mr. Gill: My point was that if the Government sent a stronger signal that they do not intend to accept bogus asylum seekers, such people would be dissuaded from setting out in the first place. Given the increasing numbers that are coming to this country, word has clearly got round that we are a soft touch.

Jackie Ballard: Those of a liberal disposition would say that the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 sent a strong signal that Britain is far from a soft touch for asylum seekers; in fact, it treats them quite punitively. As I have said, the number of asylum seekers has increased simply because the number of conflicts in Europe and the number of people who have been displaced from their countries have increased.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about sending home bogus asylum seekers rather than dispersing them, those who are known on arrival to be bogus are sent home, but it often takes time to ascertain the validity of claims. He also spoke of the bill that taxpayers in Britain will have to pay. It is true that we pay a price for accommodating and caring for asylum seekers, but it is insignificant compared to the price that those who flee repression or intimidation have to pay. What price can one put on compassion and dignity? We should not assume that all asylum seekers are economic migrants and bogus seekers of some form of nirvana. In fact, the life that they live while waiting for their claims to be processed is difficult. We as a country should do our bit, not merely in respect of international conventions but from a moral standpoint, by showing willingness to accommodate people far less fortunate than ourselves.

10.32 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on securing a debate on a matter with which he has been concerned for some months, and which raises important issues. I also congratulate him on what I suspect is his characteristic persistence in seeking the opportunity to secure it.

My hon. Friend made the very important point that many of the asylum seekers in this country who try to take advantage of the 1951 convention are themselves citizens of countries that have subscribed to the European convention on human rights. He asked the significant question why we and other European co-signatories to the convention should simply accept that little can be done about that. I remind him that the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 attempted to deal with the issue of asylum seekers who come to the United Kingdom from countries that are renowned for their reputations for safeguarding human rights. The Act provided for a list of safe third countries, whereby asylum seekers from those countries would be put on a special fast track process on the assumption that, save only in the most exceptional or extraordinary circumstances, a claim from a person who was a citizen of such a country would be regarded as manifestly unfounded. One of several policy errors that the Government have made since taking office was their decision to scrap that so-called white list of safe countries. That sent a signal to people overseas that immigration and asylum policy in the United Kingdom was being softened as a result of the new Government coming into office.

I agree with the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) that we live in an age in which vast numbers of people seek to migrate from the developing world to the developed world, and mass movements of people take place on a greater scale than at any time since the immediate aftermath of the second world war. However, I take issue with her conclusion that the majority—or anything remotely approaching the majority—of such people are in genuine fear of persecution and qualify to be treated as refugees under the terms of the 1951 United Nations convention.

During the debates in the House on the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, Government and Opposition Front Benchers agreed that it was clear from the evidence—from determinations by the Home Office and results of appeal hearings—that the overwhelming majority of people who seek asylum in the United Kingdom are bogus asylum seekers who are trying to use a claim of asylum as a means of evading our normal immigration controls. It is hard to blame them; mass communication through television and radio makes large numbers of people in poor and unstable countries aware that they have the chance of a better life if they manage to get into one of the western industrialised nations. Furthermore, racketeers are prepared to exort a lifetime's savings from such unfortunate people on the promise of being able successfully to smuggle them into, say, Britain, Germany, Norway or Switzerland.

The evidence demonstrates that most applications for asylum in this country—as in most western European countries—are unfounded, and that there is a significant connection between unfounded asylum applications and criminal or near-criminal activity by people who seek to profit from a trade in human beings.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. This is my first opportunity to take part in a debate in Westminster Hall. I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker, for arriving late and having to leave early—I have to attend a sitting of the Home Affairs Committee. However, I wanted to be able to listen to at least part of the debate.

My hon. Friend has dealt with the question of bogus asylum seekers and economic migrants. I put it to him that the logical consequence of the argument that was advanced by the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) is that this country has a responsibility to absorb people who are suffering persecution elsewhere, wherever that may be. Given that disputes are taking place all over the world, it is simply not possible to accept within these crowded islands even those people who may be the subjects of persecution. It is not fair to the population of the United Kingdom to have to absorb that quantity of people.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. Even on the basis of arriving late and going early, the hon. Gentleman's interventions should be reasonably brief.

Mr. Lidington: My hon Friend puts his point with characteristic clarity and forthrightness, and I agree with him.

In my constituency, some of those vigorous in their support for firm policies to deter unfounded asylum applications are British citizens from ethnic minority groups. They can see that, if the large-scale evasion of immigration control is allowed to continue, race relations within the United Kingdom—and the position of British people who have come to this country lawfully and in accordance with the rules—will be under threat and become insecure.

I want to make a number of points relating to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow. However, I must first say that this debate is perhaps more timely than he might realise. At 11 am, the Home Office is to release to the media the figures for asylum applications in December 1999. I hope that the Minister will not feel constrained by embargo times when she gives her reply, and will be able to share with the House of Commons the information that is to be shared with the media in less than 20 minutes.

Those figures should give further details not only of the number of applications in December, but of the progress or otherwise that the Home Office has made in increasing the number of decisions. We should also learn the latest figure for the backlog of asylum applications piling up undertermined at the Croydon headquarters of the immigration and nationality directorate.

Before I discuss the Home Office's handling of those matters, I will allude briefly to what my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow said about the broader European policy. I shall put two points to the Minister. The first concerns the impact of enlargement. When I was last in Brussels, discussing these issues with Members of the European Parliament, I found considerable disquiet that discussions on enlargement were proceeding on the fantastic basis that applicant countries would sign up to the acquis of the Community entire, and that that would include allowing full rights of freedom of movement for persons within the enlarged Union and would also include firm, well-policed external frontiers along the Union's new borders.

[Mr. Lidington]

The Members of the European Parliament who took an interest in those issues did not believe that it would be practicable for Poland, Slovakia and some other central European countries effectively to police their eastern borders with the successor republics to the former Soviet Union. There would, therefore, have to be either derogations of quite long duration over the free movement of persons from the new member states, or a rethink by the Community over its approach to the enlargement negotiations. I would welcome a view from the Government as to the realism of expecting the central European states to police their eastern borders in the way in which existing EU member states would expect.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow put his finger on a matter of great concern when he drew attention to the ambitions of some on the continent—and the avowed ambitions of the European Commission—to develop a fully integrated Community policy on asylum and immigration. If my hon. Friend has not yet had the opportunity to read it, I commend to him a study of the remarks of Commissioner Vitorino, the man responsible for this area of policy in the European Commission, when he was questioned by Members of the European Parliament as part of the confirmation process. Mr. Vitorino made no bones about what he wanted to happen. He said that "a Community strategy on asylum . . . needs to be drawn up as a matter of urgency" and that

"the Commission should strive to ensure that persons denied refugee status within the meaning of the Geneva Convention can enjoy alternative protection in terms of 'non-explusion'".

It would be interesting to know whether Commissioner Vitorino is acting beyond the policy objectives of the British and other European Union Governments or whether he has a body of support within the Council of Ministers that will turn that ambition of alternative protection for those who are denied refugee status into reality.

Commissioner Vitorino went on to say that "once Community instruments"

on asylum

"have entered into force, the Commission will employ the powers conferred on it by the Treaty and the procedures provided for therein to ensure that member states comply fully with their provisions."

He was enthusiastic about the treaty of Amsterdam and the new objective which that treaty set for the European Union of developing an area of freedom, security and justice. There is no doubt that Mr. Vitorino believes that the creation of an area of freedom, security and justice will provide tremendous opportunities for European institutions to develop further their competence over areas of policy which, until now, have been determined largely on an intergovernmental basis. He was explicit in his analogy—perhaps a stronger word than analogy should be used—between the creation of the area of freedom, security and justice and the operation of the single European market. He argued that the single market must be seen to encompass the common policies, social policies, the policy of non-discrimination, the customs union, rules of competition and, of course, all the new provisions introduced by the treaty of Amsterdam on free movement of persons, asylum and immigration. One of the characteristics of the single market, in institutional terms, is that decisions are taken on the basis of qualified majority voting with no right of veto. It is significant that the Commissioner charged with responsibility for immigration and asylum policy should be so determined to take those areas of responsibility into the remit of single market arrangements that effectively transfer competence for those policy arrangements—I am convinced that that is his long-term ambition—from member states to the supranational institutions of the Community with the Commission having sole right of initiative.

Important long-term questions remain and I am not convinced that the Government have grappled adequately with them or given a clear account to Parliament of what is happening in Brussels. People such as Mr. Vitorino openly and unashamedly wish to proceed in that direction. The Minister should tell us when she replies to the debate whether the Government will resist that from the start because it threatens British interests or whether, as with the withholding tax, they will go with the flow, try to tinker at the edges with a fundamentally unacceptable proposal and end up embarrassing themselves and threatening to damage the interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gill: Is it not perverse for Governments to turn their backs on established systems, albeit that they are not working, and, instead of using their best efforts to make them work smoothly and effectively, gallop over the horizon and create another body that will probably run into the same problems?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend puts the point well.

I want to say a little about local authorities because some councils have made points that deserve ministerial attention and a response. Then I shall make some points about the operations of the Home Office and the immigration and nationality directorate.

I shall deal first with local authorities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow and the hon. Member for Taunton said, the number of asylum seekers coming to the United Kingdom in the last couple of years has placed an enormous strain on local authorities' resources, especially, but not exclusively, on those that have important seaports or airports within their boundaries. Will the Minister tell us something about the progress made on dispersal arrangements? The Opposition have supported the dispersal plans, but I am told by Kent county council that, although there has been encouraging progress in some respects, it continues to bear an unacceptably heavy burden. Progress on dispersal is not as swift as that county would wish. I have seen press reports that there have been particular difficulties in Scotland, with Scottish local authorities proving resistant to participation in the dispersal scheme and strong opposition from both Scottish Nationalist and Labour Members of the Scottish Parliament to Scottish local authorities being required by the Home Secretary to provide centres for asylum seekers north of the border.

The leader of Hillingdon council has also raised a particular concern with me about the position of unaccompanied children, many of whom will come from the former Yugoslavia and some from countries outside Europe. There have apparently been rumours from within Whitehall that the special grant arrangements that reimburse local authorities for the very expensive task of looking after unaccompanied children will be withdrawn. If that report is true, that would place an enormous burden on Hillingdon and other local authorities. It would be good news for those councils if the Minister could deny that rumour this morning.

My main point relates to Home Office Ministers' record in handling the difficulties that have landed on their desks as a result of the large number of applications. The hon. Member for Taunton, having criticised the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, hastened to reassure the Government that it was not really their fault. There could not have been a more characteristic demonstration of the Liberal Democrats' approach to the Government.

Jackie Ballard: Clearly I need to help the hon. Gentleman with a point of personal information. I said that it was not the Government's fault that there is an increasing number of asylum seekers from Europe. The Government did not create the conflicts in Europe that have caused people to flee from their homes.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Lady is right to say that the Government did not create the conditions of conflict. Where she is wrong, and I believe that the figures published by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees support my case, is in saying that the Government bear no responsibility for the particularly difficult position in which the United Kingdom now finds itself. It is not just the United Kingdom that has had to cope with a large additional number of asylum seekers as a consequence of the collapse of Yugoslavia and the ensuing ethnic conflicts; Germany, Switzerland, the Scandinavian countries and the low countries have also had to deal with that problem. I fear that the evidence from the UNHCR is that the United Kingdom has had to cope with a greater share than previously of the total number of asylum seekers coming into western Europe. That must be due both to the message that the Government sent out in their early months in office—that they were softening immigration and asylum policy—and to the incompetence of Home Office Ministers in presiding over a system in Croydon that has allowed record backlogs of applications to pile up. People know that if they can get into this country it will be a very long time before their case is looked at in any detail, so they have the chance of either going to ground or establishing special compassionate reasons why they should not be required to leave.

Let us consider the United Nations figures in a little more detail. The UNHCR compared the number of asylum applications in western European countries made by people from the former Yugoslavia in the first three quarters of 1999 with that for a comparable period in 1998. The number of applications in the United Kingdom rose by 82 per cent. in the first three quarters of 1999 compared with the same period in the previous year. The comparable rise for Germany was 24 per cent. and for the Netherlands it was just 6 per cent. The discrepancy cannot be attributed simply to the fact that the UK took in a certain number of refugees from Kosovo as part of a planned evacuation and relocation programme which was sponsored by the UNHCR; in the third quarter of 1999, after the UNHCR had brought its programme to an end in July of that year, the UK share of Yugoslav asylum seekers had risen to 18 per cent. of the total—a larger figure than in either the first or second quarters of 1999.

The same pattern is apparent in non-Yugoslav applications. There were big rises in the asylum applications in the UK and Belgium in 1999 compared with 1998, but actual falls in the number of asylum seekers from outside Yugoslavia in Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland—all areas where large numbers of people have traditionally sought to claim asylum.

The statistical evidence, therefore, makes it clear that we have a worse record than other European countries in coping effectively with the challenge of large numbers of unfounded asylum applications. It is no good the Government wringing their hands, grinning goofily and saying, as they do so often, "Well, it's all the fault of the last Government. We've only been in office for two and a half years." Let us consider the sequence of events.

In July 1998, more than a year after the Government took office, they published a White Paper on asylum and immigration setting out clear targets for the current financial year regarding the number of decisions to be taken and appeals to be handled and the costs of immigration, nationality and asylum business. In March 1999, the Home Office annual report stated that the position at Croydon following the introduction of the new computer system and working arrangements had

"now settled and the majority of problems have been resolved."

The Home Secretary boasted that a

"step change in efficiency was made in late 1998 to early 1999".

Moreover, in last autumn's annual report of the immigration and nationality directorate, the White Paper targets for the current financial year were reaffirmed.

Both the White Paper and the IND's annual report said that the key target for 1999–2000 was for 59,000 decisions to be made on asylum applications. However, in the first eight months of the current financial year 25,885 decisions were taken. If one calculates the annualised figure, one finds that the Government must now expect about 39,000 decisions to be taken during the current financial year, which is no fewer than 20,000 decisions below the target that they set themselves in the middle of 1998 and which they reaffirmed in a report published as recently as last autumn.

The consequence of such incompetence is borne by our constituents as taxpayers. The Government White Paper estimated the cost of supporting asylum seekers for the current financial year at £350 million. In a written answer of 2 November, the Minister told me that that had now risen to an estimated £450 million to £490 million. I wonder whether her reply to this debate will reveal that that estimate has risen yet again. Our constituents must find more than £100 million extra towards the cost of asylum seekers in the current year alone because of the Government's mishandling of affairs.

[Mr. Lidington]

I am not confident that the Government have got to grips with after-entry controls. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot tabled a question early in December last year about what had happened to Kosovar asylum seekers who had come to this country as part of the United Nations plan. In a written answer of 14 December, the Minister revealed that only a quarter of Kosovars who had entered the country under the auspices of the UNHCR had returned home. Why so few? Have these people gone to ground or is there a good reason why three-quarters of those who came here temporarily until Kosovo was freed have decided to remain within the United Kingdom?

Does the Government's analysis bear out the Daily Mail report of December last year that many asylum seekers whose claims had been rejected by the Home Office had simply disappeared into the community rather than return home? Islington council's statistics were taken as a sample: of 94 asylum seekers whose cases had been rejected, 44 had vanished. According to the Daily Mail, if one extrapolated from those figures, thousands of asylum seekers had gone to ground in the latter months of 1999. Do the Government intend to invest more resources into after-entry controls and deportation? Do they still believe that they are on target—set in the White Paper and in the IND annual report—for the removal of 8,000 failed asylum seekers?

The Minister set herself one target that was so ambitious that I blinked several times when I first read it. In a letter to the Public Accounts Committee in October 1999, the Permanent Secretary at the Home Office said that the Department's aim was to clear all current asylum applications by October 2000. I tabled a written question to the Minister about that and she reaffirmed that that was indeed the Government's target. She claimed that clearing them all by that date was a staging post towards the aim of ensuring that, by April 2001, all determinations and appeals take place within six months. If that truly is the Government's target, between now and October this year, they will have to clear the backlog of more than 100,000 asylum cases that have piled up at Croydon. On the basis of the Government's record thus far, that target is unrealistic.

Recent legislation has led us to believe that the Government have at last begun to grasp the gravity of the challenge posed by large numbers of unfounded asylum applications in the United Kingdom. However, their own words, policies, incompetence and complacency have landed not just them, but our constituents, in this mess. We need much greater evidence of effective activity from Ministers before we can have confidence that they are up to dealing with the challenge.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I have been so intrigued by the debate that I thought that it was important to stay to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington). I hope that I will also be able to stay to hear the Minister who, I imagine, would like to start her remarks in about five or 10 minutes' time. I shall therefore be brief. I put on record my appreciation of the way in which the Minister has handled one or two tricky cases in my constituency. She does not have an easy job and it would be wrong not to thank her personally for a couple of individual cases, notwithstanding my overall criticism of the Government's handling of the policy.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury said, severe impositions have been placed on local authorities. The impact has fallen disproportionately. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) told us of the difficulties in Kent. We are all familiar with the severe problems in Kent and the inadequate support that the Government are giving to councils that are particularly burdened by the problem.

I met a lady this morning in a London borough who is a neighbour of mine. She told me that recently she had had to evict her married daughter and grandchild because they were overcrowded. Even though the daughter had been on the council waiting list for seven years, no council accommodation was available. She was told that, as she was not a refugee, she was a low priority. My neighbour had the unhappy task of evicting her daughter and grandchild because precedence is being given to asylum seekers. People in this country are extremely concerned about that.

My second point is that there has been a lack of vigour in dealing with the backlog. People are going to ground. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury referred to my recent question to the Minister, which graphically illustrated that point. This is a failure of Government—probably not assisted by the courts, it must be said, which seek to provide every opportunity to gainsay the will of Parliament, which wants action to be taken. It is essential for the confidence of the British people in the system that those who are given every opportunity to claim asylum, but whose applications are rejected, leave the country and that the means are found to achieve that, unpleasant though it sometimes may be.

My third point was drawn to my attention by a constituent whose son, a former soldier in the Army, is now a long-distance lorry driver. He wrote to tell me that his son is extremely concerned at the consequences of the fines that come into effect on 1 February. If he is found to have an illegal immigrant in his lorry, he and his company will each be fined £2,000. The real issue is that this man takes great care to ensure that such people are not in his vehicle, but his father described what happens when he arrives in Calais. All sorts of ruses are undertaken by asylum seekers to gain access to the lorry and to any areas where a person can be concealed such as in packaging, boxes or whatever. There is then the rather revolting task of clearing up the consequences of human occupation. The one thing that he was overwhelmingly worried about was the fact that the French police stand there, see what is going on and do absolutely nothing about it. That confirms what I was told one night when I was in my consituency and my mobile phone rang. At the other end were two reporters from the Daily Mail, who said, "We are in Calais, and you will not believe what we are seeing here. There are all these fancy security arrangements for asylum seekers, all state-of-the-art stuff, but they are basically just nipping over the wall and climbing on to the lorries, and the French police are doing nothing about it."

The French police are not the Minister's responsibility, and I shall not hold her to account for them. However, it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that our continental partners take much more vigorous action to prevent the abuse that is occurring. If our partners consider the matter a European issue, they should show a bit more communautaire spirit and try to help the British Government to solve the problem.

I shall refer only briefly to the general issue, because I shall return to it at a later date. As a nation, we have no reason to be ashamed of our record in receiving victims of oppression in other parts of the world. The people of this country have shown extraordinary tolerance and great magnanimity in trying to accommodate people. However, as I said in my intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury, and having listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard), conflicts are taking place throughout the world. The country deserves to know whether, even if large numbers of people are genuinely victims of oppression, given the crowded nature of these islands and the pressure on our infrastructure, we have an unlimited obligation to accept them.

I merely ask the question. Many of our constituents are asking us to answer it. It especially grieves me when I am urged by bleeding-heart liberals—I am not necessarily referring to the hon. Member for Taunton—that we should do more for countries that oppress their people. The same people told us that we had no business being the colonial Government in those countries, which were then well run, prosperous and democratic, and people enjoyed the security that the stability of British administration provided. We are dealing with big questions, but I shall not deal with them as I realise that the Minister has a lot of information to deal with and impart to us.

11.12 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Barbara Roche): Last year, record numbers of people claimed asylum in the UK. The official Home Office figure, released for the first time this morning, is that 71,160 asylum applications were made during 1999. Understandably, and rightly, many people will be worried by that figure and by the increasing number of asylum seekers coming to the UK in recent years.

The UK is not alone in experiencing substantial increases. In one recent month alone, in the Republic of Ireland, with a much smaller population, 1,000 people sought asylum. The problem must be examined in its European context.

Experience has shown that the majority of people seeking asylum are economic migrants, rather than those in need of international protection under the conventions. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that we must maintain the integrity of our asylum system. The concept of seeking refuge and protection and becoming a refugee is historic, and deeply rooted in the very best of human principles, but that means that we must protect what it stands for: providing protection to those in genuine need. However, it also means deterring would-be economic migrants from making unfounded asylum applications here as a means of avoiding normal immigration rules. Why?—Because that devalues the concept of seeking asylum and is seen as a means of evading immigration control. Allowing such avoidance would be an affront to people who have lawfully settled here, using the appropriate methods and often waiting patiently to do so.

I will say a little about the system that we inherited. It was to restore integrity to a failing system that the Government undertook the most fundamental review of immigration and asylum rules for more than 25 years. Our aim was to make the system fairer, faster and firmer than the dreadful system that we inherited.

Our international obligations as signatories to the 1951 refugee convention mean that we have to consider all claims for asylum made at the ports, or within the United Kingdom. We are not alone in that. We cannot turn our back on those in genuine need of protection. This country has a proud tradition of giving shelter to those fleeing from persecution in other parts of the world, and that will continue. I am one of its beneficiaries. Long may it do so!

The key to ensuring that the asylum system is not manipulated by those who merely seek economic betterment is to process claims quickly. That is why the 1998 White Paper committed us to a target of two months for most initial decisions and to a further four months to deal with most appeals by April 2001. We are taking measures to achieve that and putting in place new procedures—especially in view of other countries' procedures. We are recruiting more staff to process applications. Of course, that means spending more: in the coming three years, we shall spend an additional £120 million on speeding up decisions and on increasing the number of asylum case workers. That is important.

A substantial number of asylum applications have been made at our ports and in-country following clandestine entry. To respond to those pressures, and to help speed up the system, we are setting up a new reception centre at Oakington, near Cambridge. Oakington's purpose is to help deal with claims on which a rapid decision appears possible. Applicants will be required to stay at the centre for about seven days while their claim is being decided. There will be a relaxed regime, with minimal physical security. If a case has to take longer than others, or if an appeal is pending, applicants will be granted temporary admission or, if necessary, removed to an ordinary detention centre.

Mr. Lidington: Bearing in mind all the things that the Government take pride in, has the backlog of asylum applications passed the 100,000 mark? When does the Minister expect it to begin falling?

Mrs. Roche: The backlog has increased beyond the 100,000 mark, although the hon. Gentleman of course knows that the Government whom he supported contributed to more than 50,000 of those applications. Given the current pattern of decision making, we expect a consistent falling of the figures in line with the targets that we have announced. Oakington is likely to open in the spring.

Too many of those seeking clandestine entry reach the UK by concealing themselves in lorries. That is unacceptable. I shall comment on the principal responsibility. I shall deal with the comments made by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) in due course. He made some kind remarks, and I attribute them to the esprit de corps that extends to the Home Affairs Committee, of which I was a member. However, I should pay tribute to the excellent contribution made by my private office.

[Mrs. Roche]

Too many of those seeking clandestine entry reach the UK by concealing themselves in lorries. The principal responsibility for remedying the problem must lie with drivers, owners or operators of vehicles that are being targeted. That is why we are introducing a new civil penalty, to which high priority will be given. When it is implemented, the owner, operator or driver of any vehicle that transports clandestine entrants to the UK will be subject to a £2,000 penalty per clandestine entrant. The new civil penalty will complement the criminal offence that applies to those who deliberately facilitate illegal entry. We are increasing the maximum sentence for facilitation from seven to 10 years' imprisonment.

Much mention has been made of asylum support, and the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) seemed to become somewhat muddled. At the moment, we are discussing interim arrangements—the voluntary dispersal scheme that is co-ordinated by the Local Government Association. As the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) said, the new support scheme will start from 1 April, and I can assure her that no local authority will have the power of veto. The Home Office will take responsibility and contract directly with accommodation providers. We are consulting widely with local authorities, so that we can make use of their understanding of local circumstances.

I want to deal with some of the issues that were raised in respect of the Government's actions and record. What was our inheritance on taking office? As hon. Members will know, in 1996, the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), who is now shadow Home Secretary, piloted an Act that achieved something quite remarkable. Where it allowed some who claim asylum in the UK at Dover, Heathrow, or any of our ports and airports, to continue to claim social security cash benefits, others—this is the interesting point—were told that they would receive nothing. A number of court cases resulted, and the view was taken that, under the Children Act 1989 and the National Assistance Act 1948, local authorities must pick up the tab. Hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Canterbury, and local authorities in Kent and London saw that the burden lay with them. Of those who sought asylum, 80 per cent. reside in London and Kent. The problems that local authorities face should be laid at the door of the previous Government, the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald and the hon. Member for Aylesbury.

The Opposition tried to undermine our proposals on the civil penalty. In Committee, they spoke through the night—in fact for 20 hours—and sought to delay dispersal. With the support of the hon. Member for Aylesbury, the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald tabled an amendment that would have wrecked the Bill and cost the people of this country £500 million. In a letter, she described the amendment as a sensible, common-sense provision. That is the same right hon. Lady who, when she held my post, approved budget cuts to the immigration and nationality directorate of the Home Office that would have cut staffing levels at Croydon by 1,200, were it not for action that this Government took after the general election. That is the same right hon. Lady who negotiated the Siemens contract for the new information technology system at Croydon, and who is responsible for many of the difficulties that we face.

It is little wonder that it has been said of the previous Tory Government that they left our immigration and asylum system in a complete shambles. Who was the author of that remark? It was David Mellor, in August 1999. The hon. Member for Aylesbury smiles, but having been a Minister of State at the Home Office, David Mellor was in a good position to assess the matter.

I shall deal with some other matters that have been raised. The hon. Member for Aylesbury mentioned our position in relation to the French. I assure him that there is very good co-operation between our immigration officials and those of France. I know that not merely because I have seen it on paper, but because I go to ports and speak to those concerned. As a result of the recent actions in France, more than 60 facilitators were charged, and many imprisoned.

Asylum seekers from central Europe, especially Poland and the Czech Republic, have been mentioned, and my written comments on that have been accurately described in this debate. Overwhelmingly, the claims of people who come from those countries have been unfounded, and we have moved as swiftly as we can to deal with those cases.

A question was asked about the removals target. I assure hon. Members that we are absolutely on target in respect of removals. A proper removals target is essential if we are to maintain the integrity of our policy.

In Amsterdam, the Prime Minister secured a protocol to the treaty to ensure that the UK will be able to retain control of its own borders. That will remain the case.

Mr. Gill: As the Minister will be aware, I initiated the debate. So far, however, she has not addressed her reply to any of the points that I made. I recognise that time is short, but will she undertake, before she sits down, to reply to me in writing?

Mrs. Roche: Without wishing to be discourteous to the hon. Gentleman, if he had not made that intervention, I would have had an extra minute to reply to his points.

The hon. Gentleman has completely misunderstood our responsibilities under the 1951 United Nations convention. We still have an obligation under that convention—regardless of the European convention on human rights—to look in detail at each asylum application that is made to us. That is not only our responsibility, but that of every other signatory of the 1951 convention.

I am well aware of the hon. Gentleman's Euro-sceptic views, but I should like to be able to convince him that the United Kingdom has much to gain from close involvement with Europe in this context, as in many others. For example, we are applying to join the non-borders elements of the Schengen agreement, including the information system and other measures to tackle illegal immigration. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that organised crime is involved in the smuggling and trafficking of human beings, but we can defeat that only by working with our partners internationally.

We expect to derive significant benefits from opting into measures on common standards for dealing with asylum seekers. Common standards across the EU will mean that there is much less incentive for asylum seekers to go asylum shopping for the best deal. That is why I disagree with the hon. Gentleman, who seeks an isolationist position for the UK. Ensuring that we have common standards will encourage claimants to stay in the first member state that they reach. Meanwhile, the 1999 Act contains provisions that will strengthen our ability to return asylum seekers to other member states under the Dublin convention.

Therefore, I totally reject any assertion that the Government are soft on those who try to exploit our asylum system. We want a system that is firm, fair and fast and offers protection to those most in need and in genuine fear, but which ensures that those who make unfounded claims will be swiftly returned to the countries from which they have come.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The time is up and we must now move on to the next debate.

Football Safety

11.30 am

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): First, I should say a word about the title of this debate. The aspect of safety that I wish to talk about concerns goalposts. I should make it clear that I am talking not about professional football, but about football played locally on sports fields and recreation grounds, in or out of school, by organised clubs or by groups of people informally.

It is an unfortunate and tragic fact that at least nine children have been killed in such circumstances in the past 13 years. Some may be surprised that children are being killed by something as inert as a set of goalposts. The most recent incident occurred last summer. A seven-year-old boy in Dewsbury was killed when free-standing goalposts toppled over, causing a fatal blow to his head, after children had been swinging on the crossbar. That case is being pursued by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor). That tragedy was made all the more appalling by the fact that a fatal goalpost accident was first recorded as long ago as 1986, when a seven-year-old boy was killed. In 1990 an eight-year-old boy was killed and then a 12-year-old girl, when a ball kicked with some force again caused a frame to topple over. In 1991 an 11-year-old boy was killed at Witham in Essex. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), whose constituency contains that town, wishes to say a word about that.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): My hon. Friend mentioned the tragic death of the son of my constituent, Mrs. Brenda Smith of Witham. Mrs. Smith has campaigned for many years to draw public attention to the continuing deaths and injuries from dangerous goalposts. Indeed, late last year Mrs. Smith and I met my hon. Friend the Minister, and we were encouraged by her positive response. Does my hon. Friend agree that the way forward is a combination of safe equipment and greater public awareness?

Mr. Blizzard: I agree with those points, but other steps can be taken. One important feature of that incident was the fact that the goalposts were not factory made by a reliable manufacturer—a point that I shall develop later.

In 1994, a six-year-old boy was killed on holiday. Again the crossbar, which was a piece of scaffold pole, toppled over. In 1995, a 13-year-old boy was killed and in 1996 a two-year-old girl. Again in 1996, a 10-year-old girl was killed when posts toppled over: one set had been leaning against a wall. It is possible that there were a couple more deaths in 1996, but I do not have details of them. Each of those deaths was a tragedy, but collectively they are a disgrace, because they were all preventable.

I should explain my constituency interest in this matter. A firm in Lowestoft in my constituency, Harrod UK, is the country's leading goalpost manufacturer. It has nothing to do with Harrods, the Knightsbridge version. Harrod UK supplies nearly all the premier league clubs, including Manchester United. It supplied goalposts for Euro 96 and for the new Cardiff stadium, and will probably do so for the new Wembley stadium, too.

[Mr. Blizzard]

The chairman of the company, Mr. Ron Harrod, has campaigned on goalpost safety since 1991. He is a recognised technical expert. He represents this country on the CEN—the European Committee for Standardisation—and has done so for the past seven years. He took his campaign to the "That's Life" programme in 1991 and made representations to Iain Sproat, the Minister in the previous Government, but received little response.

If we analyse this sad list of fatal accidents, we find that they almost all involve free-standing, movable goalposts, particularly the smaller 6 ft size used for five, six and seven-aside games. The goalposts topple forward when someone swings on or applies pressure to the crossbar. Almost all are home made or adapted from factory models by well-meaning people, but with disastrous consequences. That is exemplified by the police report into the Dewsbury case and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury for showing that to me. The goalposts were originally full-sized posts and had concreted into the ground, but they had been taken down and adapted. They were heavy—it took three adults to move them—but they were not anchored and of the 21 strong steel spikes that were supplied originally, only one was left and the remainder had been substituted with 10 camping-type pegs, which were not up to the job.

An expert witmess from the Health and Safety Executive stated that, because of the design, only a small amount of force was required to make the posts fall forward under their own weight. Design is the key, and it is important to maximise stability to minimise weight. Harrod UK has developed technical solutions to make the posts safe, particularly with the use of anchors, but also with prominent labels on the equipment and bold instruction leaflets. As a result of the campaigning and committee work of people such as Ron Harrod, a European standard—BSEN 748— now exists for full-sized goalposts. Guidelines and safety warnings have been issued by various organisations, including the HSE, the British Association of Advisers and Lecturers in Physical Education, the Institute of Sport and Recreation Managers and the National Playing Fields Association. The Football Association, through the county associations, advises referees to check them before use. Indeed, the laws of association football require that frames "must be anchored securely to the ground".

Many games, kickabouts and training sessions all over the country do not take place under FA rules and the guidelines have not stopped accidents and deaths. Above all, there is not yet a standard for small, free-standing goal posts.

At the inquiry into the Dewsbury tragedy, the coroner recommended that such a standard be developed. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport has taken a close interest in that. She kindly met me and Harrod UK in December and progress has been made. The British Standards Institution has agreed to draw up a standard, but that takes two years to develop, so it will introduce a publicly available specification—a PAS—which can be developed more quickly. We hope that that will be done this year. The FA has agreed to fund the development of that and is sending out new safety guidelines, of which I have already seen a draft.

Vital issues remain outstanding. Although a British standard and FA guidelines will make a valuable contribution, they will not alone solve the problem or stop the deaths. The standard will not cover existing goalposts. A standard in this country is voluntary and a manufacturer does not have to adopt it. Most important, we do not have a law making it illegal to make, sell or use non-standard equipment. The new standard will not overcome the main problem, which is the use of homemade or adapted goalposts. By their nature, the pieces of equipment are not made by recognised manufacturers, most of whom would follow the recommended standard. Will my hon. Friend consider the possibility of legislation, so that when safety is involved only equipment that meets the recognised standard is allowed to be sold and used in this country? Will she consider the position in France, where the standard is incorporated into legislation? I understand that it is now illegal in France to make, distribute or use non-standard goalposts. In Germany, a standard is not incorporated in legislation, but I understand that insurance is invalid if non-standard equipment is used, leaving providers and users open to civil proceedings by the injured party. That concentrates the mind and introduces a safety culture.

The standard may give us a safe product, but how do we ensure that goalposts are used properly and safely? How do we ensure that the anchors, which are the answer to the problem, are utilised routinely? The police inquiry into the Dewsbury incident made an interesting point in its conclusion. It said:

"There is some concern amongst staff about the role of the HSE and its relationship to Local Authority Environmentally Health for these issues. It is not clear who has responsibility for enforcement. This needs clarifying so that it is clear who has responsibility for enforcement and any future cases."

The HSE wrote to my constituent, Ron Harrod, in 1996, and made the important point that:

"sports equipment does not usually fall into the category of work equipment. This means that the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 concerning the design and manufacture of equipment will not apply. The HSE therefore has no remit in this respect, and all matters of design of sports and play equipment fall to the Department of National Heritage"— now the Department of Culture, Media and Sport.

I wrote to the HSE at the end of last year, and was told that only two of those nine incidents occurred in circumstances in which the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act applied, and in which the HSE was the enforcing authority. In the other cases, which often involved children playing with home-made goalposts during their own free time, there was no legal duty on anyone under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act. The activities of voluntary football clubs or of children playing on their own would not be covered by the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act.

Which is the responsible enforcement authority in these cases? The questions of enforcement, inspection and responsibility need to be clarified so that they can be comprehensive in their coverage. I also agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree that we need a high-profile campaign to get across to people playing in these circumstances what they have to do, and the importance of carrying out the safety checks and procedures.

In conclusion, I emphasise the following points. A British standard for small free-standing goalposts, which we are now going to have, is an important step forward, as are more guidelines from the Football Association. However, if we are to take safety truly seriously, and to ensure that our children do not continue to be put at risk of being killed by goalposts, we must ensure that only safe goalposts can be made, sold and used in this country. We must do that if we seriously want to avoid more children being added to the tragic list that has accumulated over the past 13 years.

The Minister for Sport (Kate Hoey): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) on securing a debate on such an important subject. I also welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) and thank him for his short contribution.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney outlined a difficult problem, which concerns all of us involved with the safety of young children, especially when they are involved in sporting activities. Many other hon. Members share that concern, and have expressed their regret at not being able to be here for the debate.

All those playing sport, especially children, should be able to do so in safety. As my hon. Friend pointed out, nine children have been killed in accidents involving goalposts since 1986. That is nine too many. It is worrying that of the nine, five children aged between two and 13 have lost their lives since 1994. It is important that the coroners noted that the accidents were not just the result of kids being kids. Many of the mobile goals collapsed during normal use in the course of matches. Many adults have also been injured in this way.

Figures from the Department of Trade and Industry's consumer safety unit show that 1,943 people suffered injuries in accidents involving goalposts between 1990 and 1997. However, that figure includes full-size, permanent equipment as well as mobile goalposts, and by no means all those incidents were caused by faulty equipment.

I became Minister for Sport shortly after the tragic death last July of Jack Sheerin, who died after being hit by the falling crossbar of a mobile goal. That tragedy led to much publicity, and Jack's parents—together with parents of other children recently killed or injured—are determined that such a tragedy should never happen again. Mrs. Sheerin rightly drew the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) who, in turn, raised it with me. This week, I received a petition signed by 1,071 people from Jack's home town of Thornhill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree came to see me last October with Mrs. Brenda Smith, the mother of Jonathan Smith, who was tragically killed in 1991. I pay tribute to her work over the years in bringing the issue to the attention of those in authority and to everyone in the sport. I gained much valuable information from her and I was struck by her determination to raise awareness of the issue.

I regard it as a priority to make progress on minimum standards for mobile goalposts. Mobile goals designed for use in five-a-side are different from permanent, full-sized goals, which are secured to concrete or other mountings. Permanent goalposts are subject to the British standard BSEN 748, which was introduced in 1996. Mobile goals serve a different purpose, often enabling children to play competitive matches on appropriately sized pitches. They are designed to be dismantled and stored easily, particularly at the end of the match or training session when there is often little room for storage.

A range of mobile goals manufactured by reputable firms in a variety of sizes and specifications has been available to clubs for many years. They are either lightweight constructions of plastic or aluminium or are made of heavier steel pipes, which are designed to be securely anchored in the ground. If fitted and maintained in accordance with the manufacturer's instructions, this equipment is safe to use. However, many of the goals in children's matches are adapted from full-size goals or are constructed on a do-it-yourself basis—often by well-meaning parents who are anxious to help out their sons' or daughters' clubs. The goal that killed Jack Sheerin was cut down from a full-sized one and it was not secured to the ground. The collapse of home-made equipment contructed from scaffolding poles led to the deaths of Jonathan Smith in 1991 and David O'Neill in 1994. I am sure that those goals were built with the best of intentions, but there is no place for dangerously unsafe equipment in sport and there is a clear need for an effective safety standard.

The variety of mobile goals in use makes it difficult to impose standards, which are the responsibility of individual clubs rather than of local government or the football authority. Local authorities are responsible for the design and maintenance of their own facilities, including goalposts and other sports equipment. The Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, as my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney said, requires those who control football pitches used by others to take reasonable measures to ensure the safety of the equipment that they provide. However, the Act does not apply to equipment provided by the users themselves. Most mobile goals owned and used by adult and children's amateur football clubs throughout the country are the responsibility of the clubs themselves, even when club matches are played on local authority pitches.

I have been asked to consider introducing legislation to set minimum standards or to hold local authorities and other sports ground owners responsible for all equipment used on their property. I understand those calls and why people feel so strongly that that is necessary. I am prepared to reflect further. However, we must consider whether such legislation could make a difference. I am prepared to take into account what is happening in France and Germany. We could learn from what they have achieved in France using a combination of legislation and standards.

I have been holding discussions with goalpost manufacturers since the autumn. As my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney said, I have had a meeting with Harrod UK, a leading company in the field based in his constituency. It is clear from those discussions that all the manufacturers are concerned to do as much as they can to ensure that the 3,500-odd sets of fixed and mobile goalposts that they produce each year are safe. Problems with mobile equipment arise when clubs use home-made or unsuitable goalposts. While I can see how people immediately assume that legislation would help, we must consider carefully how it would work. However, I undertake to look into the matter again.

An important way forward is to ensure, as my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree said, that all clubs and coaches are aware of the dangers of inadequate equipment and of best practice in the design, use and maintenance of mobile goalposts. I have encouraged the Football Association and the British Standards Institution to consider a British standard for mobile goals as a matter of urgency.

The FA issued a guidance note on the design and use of mobile goalposts back in 1991, which it has regularly updated. It is a good, clear document and I am anxious that all amateur football clubs and coaches working with young people have access to it. The FA has circulated a note to all affiliated football coaches since the last tragic death in July, and reprinted it prominently in an issue of its magazine, Insight. I have been in touch with the FA to ensure that, having done that, it does not forget about the issue for the next six months; it must continue regularly to bring it to people's attention.

To ensure that the guidance note reaches a wider audience, including ground staff working for bodies that are not affiliated to the FA, I wrote to several leisure and local government bodies last November asking them to ensure that the guidance note receives as much publicity as possible. So far, I have had an encouraging response. The Chief Leisure Officers Association has circulated the note to all its members and including it on its website, and the Institute of Leisure and Amenity Management has ensured that its members are fully aware of best practice.

Raising awareness of this issue with the people who run junior teams is vital. Many demands are placed on those who take on the task of coaching junior teams and arranging matches. I was recently contacted by the manager of an under-eights team in Cheshire, who listed the many stressful duties it is necessary to carry out before a competitive match or training session involving children can kick off. Transport has to be organised, subscriptions collected and playing areas checked for sharp and other dangerous or unpleasant objects. It is a demanding routine, which must often be carried out while supervising excited children. However, my correspondent stressed—I am sure that this view is shared by all those who are involved with young players—that safety must be the primary consideration, and that there must be no compromise on the standards of equipment. I hope that, in time, everyone involved in children's sport will demonstrate a similar awareness of safety issues.

As well as ensuring that those running local football clubs are fully aware of the need to make sure that all equipment is in good condition and that it is used correctly, I am also anxious to encourage the setting of a minimum standard. Following my meetings with manufacturers, I was pleased when many of them—including the firm that is based in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney—attended a meeting with the FA and the British Standards Institution, where much progress was made.

Setting a British standard is a lengthy process involving much research and consultation. As my hon. Friend said, it can take up to two years. While manufacturers of mobile goalposts are working towards that standard, I am glad to say that they have agreed as a matter of urgency to develop, with the BSI, a publicly available specification. That will be a much quicker process. The institution has agreed in principle that when the publicly available specification is published, it will be given fast-track consideration with a view to its forming the basis of a full British standard.

Mr. Blizzard: I am encouraged by what my hon. Friend has said about how much activity is being concentrated on trying to deal with the problem. Could not the authorities include in the circulars that they send out a strong recommendation that every club or organisation checks to see whether goalposts are from a reliable manufacturer or are of the do-it-yourself variety, and couple that with an equally strong recommendation that they cease using the latter type immediately? Dangerous goalposts could still be in use as we sit here now.

Kate Hoey: My hon. Friend is quite right. Even if we get the standard and make things better for the future, dangerous goalposts could still be in use all around the country. I will suggest strongly that it could be put in that light rather than as just a simple piece of information. The FA and the institution are contributing to the costs of the research work and will issue a joint document shortly, covering the design, use and maintenance of existing mobile equipment. I am pleased that the organisations are working together on this, as it is very important.

I hope that I have demonstrated that the Government and I as Minister for Sport take this issue very seriously. Sports safety is becoming more of an issue because increasingly in this country people go to legislation if something happens. Sports, particularly at the voluntary level, will find it difficult if they are involved in costly legislation. It is crucial that they act to avoid the terrible tragedies that can happen to families.

I will continue to meet many of the people involved in manufacturing, regulating and using mobile goals, and to talk to my hon. Friends who have taken an interest. I am sorry that I cannot promise instant legislation. I will look to how we might combine the best efforts of everyone to ensure that the safety aspect is balanced by people themselves being responsible for the measures that they take when they are working with children. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue today and for helping to promote the awareness that is so necessary to ensure the safety of our children.

Rural Magistrates Courts

11.57 am

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise this important issue today and I thank the Parliamentary Secretary for being here to reply.

There is no doubt that courthouse closures have exercised many hon. Members over a number of years. Closures have occurred up and down the country. The evidence is not only anecdotal but factual. I consulted the Library to establish how many courthouses had closed in the past 10 years. The number of courthouses has diminished by 28 per cent. in that time, and now each serving courthouse looks after, on average, half as many people again.

There has therefore been a significant change. For rural communities, closure of rural courthouses, has a special resonance because their impact on local communities is particularly acute. In 1998, five courthouses were closed in Suffolk. In the Suffolk magistrates courts committee annual report of 1997-98, the chairman of the committee described the situation as follows:

"It was found that five court houses were either under utilised or did not meet security standards or both. We have decided to close these five courts at Felixstowe, Haverhill, Newmarket, Saxmundham, and Stowmarket... We consulted widely before making our decision which is now the subject of an appeal by the County Council to the Lord Chancellor."

That appeal was not successful. The truth of the matter, and I must be blunt, is that no budgetary reason whatever was given for the closure of those courthouses. The cross-party county council objected to their closure, as did every district council and every Member of Parliament of both political parties in the county. The Law Society objected, and to be frank, the consultation was, at best, minimal. Defending solicitors were not consulted at all. Members of Parliament posed the chairman of the courts committee a series of important questions about the impact, cost and implications of the closures, but those points were left unanswered. It is beyond belief that when Members of Parliament tried to meet the courts committee to discuss the court closures, the committee refused to meet the democratically elected representatives of the people of Suffolk. So much for the consultation process.

Less than 18 months on, two smaller courthouses that are left, at Sudbury and Mildenhall, appear to be under threat. I salute the campaign undertaken by the East Anglian Daily Times to preserve them. In a letter to the editor of the paper, Mr. Terry Hunt, the chairman of Suffolk magistrates' courts committee, Mrs. Anne Dunford, wrote:

"May I put the record straight with regard to Sudbury and Mildenhall magistrates courts? Suffolk Magistrates' Courts Committee has no plans at the present time to close either courthouse."

Later, it stated:

"If the new arrangements were possible at Bury St. Edmunds, we would expect to review the situation, but I can assure your readers that courthouse closures are not presently under discussion."

What the lady meant by that is that they intend ultimately to construct a purpose-built courthouse in Bury St. Edmunds, which would bring the total number of courthouses in the county to three. Mrs. Dunford did not flatly reject the idea that those two smaller courthouses should close. She declined the opportunity to close them. Knowing what happened two years ago because of a lack of consultation, I fear what might be in the pipeline.

Our reason for raising this important matter is not merely to talk about Suffolk alone because the situation is replicated across the country. The point at issue is the relationship between magistrates courts committees and central Government, and whether the Government have issued guidance to the committees on the closure of courts. It has been brought to my attention and to that of my hon. Friends, the Law Society and others, as the House of Commons Library can confirm. The answer is that none has been given. Even county councils, which in Suffolk have provided 20 per cent. of the courts committees' budget, are unable to bring effective pressure to bear.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Will my hon. Friend press on with his campaign, not only for East Anglia but for the whole country? Devon has 17 magistrates courts, but it is estimated that 10 will be closed. Some are a great distance apart. If, say, the Lord Chancellor decided to close a court in Ealing, and told people that they had to go to Reading for magistrates proceedings, they would think that the Lord Chancellor was mad. Closing the court in Axminster and making people go to Exeter is just as bad: it is madness. My hon. Friend must press on with the campaign, which I am sure many hon. Members will support in order to deal with this national rather local problem.

Mr. Spring: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's comment. The situation developing in Devon is replicated in many other parts of the country.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I should like to add to the comments of the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir Peter Emery). Not only Devon will be affected, although that is important enough, but Devon and Cornwall. The magistrates courts committee of Devon and Cornwall is considering proposals to close 13 courts in both counties. Does the right hon. Member for East Devon agree that justice should be done, and be seen to be done locally? Those courts are a vital part of our rural infrastructure and should not be undermined. Furthermore, for the reasons that the right hon. Member for East Devon gave, the savings will be marginal at best, and by closing most of the courts the magistrates courts committee will probably add to the cost of justice.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. This is a short debate, and interventions must be brief.

Mr. Spring: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's point. My right hon. Friend the Member for East Devon, who made his point powerfully, has my absolute assurance that the bit is between my teeth. I hope that the Minister will feel the sincere passion that those of us who represent rural constituencies feel about this most important subject and the threat to our way of life in our local communities.

[Mr. Spring]

That is the heart of the matter. I know of no comparable circumstances in which money is supplied from the public purse and the relationship is not arm's length but no length at all. It is an infinitesimal sort of relationship, involving neither guidance nor control. As the Minister will know, a funding formula is used for the NHS, education and the police, which takes into account elements such as rurality, sparsity and capitation in dividing up the public purse. Such elements do not seem to be considered by magistrates courts committees. Two years ago, the entire community of Suffolk, including magistrates and those affected by the court closures, objected to what happened. No budgetary reason was given, and the magistrates courts committee went ahead and closed the courts. Throughout the country, magistrates courts committees seem to have a dose of incurable and rampant "centralisationitis". They seem to want to immortalise themselves by erecting edifices that no one in the rural communities, other than themselves, wants.

I return to the circumstances that prompted me to request a debate this morning—the threat to the two courts at Mildenhall and Sudbury. Mildenhall, in my constituency, has a population of 13,500, but serves the entire area covered by Forest Heath district council—approximately 55,000 people. It has been suggested that it is only a 20-minute drive to Bury St. Edmunds. However, the Mildenhall court serves not only the people of Mildenhall and the immediately surrounding hamlets and villages, but the nearby town of Newmarket, which is substantially larger, the villages and hamlets of the fens nearby, Lakenheath, with a population of more than 5,000, and Brandon, with a population of more than 8,000.

Those communities are not especially affluent: 23 per cent. of households in the area covered by Forest Heath district council do not have access to a motor car. If Mildenhall court is closed, what will happen to my constituents who must go to Bury St. Edmunds from Brandon? In Brandon, 26 per cent. of households do not have access to a car. I have examined the bus timetables for all those areas, going to Bury St. Edmunds. The court starts at 10 o'clock. Someone who lives in Brandon and must reach Bury St. Edmunds for the start of a court session would have to catch a bus at 7.52 am. The journey would last for more than an hour, and the bus would arrive in Bury St. Edmunds at 8.56 am—

Sir Peter Emery: They are lucky to have a bus.

Mr. Spring: That is the point. The number of bus services in rural areas is limited, and it is something else for people to make judgments about the future of those courthouses based on the assumption that people automatically have access to a motor car.

I have spoken to many local journalists who cover proceedings in the courthouses, and have asked them what effect previous closures have had on delays and difficulties in reaching courthouses for my constituents in places such as Newmarket and Haverhill, where the courthouses were closed. They have told me that those closures have resulted in delays and difficulties for defendants, witnessess, solicitors and everyone else involved. What will be the end result if smaller courthouses are closed? There will be more traffic and higher car usage as friends, family and solicitors work together to provide transport. Clearly, as the Liberal Democrat Lord Phillips of Sudbury pointed out, the environmental impact will be negative. Lord Phillips has spoken about the importance of local justice as enshrined in magna carta. On 14 January, he stated in the East Anglian Daily Times that "We are now abolishing it 800 years later without any thought to the impact on local communities, who are seeing the erosion of much-loved, long-standing institutions."

Local magistrates understand their communities and know the families who are involved in community life. Often, magistrates are small business people who were born and bred in their communities. They can spot troublemakers, and are familiar with families and communities with special problems. That is the essence of the local criminal justice system. All that knowledge, wisdom and experience are being thrown out willy-nilly up and down the country as courthouses are closed down. That is lamentable.

In a politically ecumenical spirit, I shall refer to a letter published in the East Anglian Daily Times from a former magistrate, Councillor Sue Thomas, who is a member of the South Suffolk Labour party. She points out that there are only five courthouses in Suffolk, and if two more were abolished, Suffolk would have fewer courthouses than any other county. In respect of counties with populations of between 600,000 and 700,000, Suffolk already has the fewest courthouses. For example, Lincolnshire has 12 courthouses and Devon—which, as we have heard, is also under threat—has 14. The criminal justice system is being sliced like a salami. That is deeply damaging, and offensive to people of all political persuasions.

As a result, travel time and environmental damage will increase, and the existing problem of recruiting magistrates will be exacerbated. The difficulties experienced by defendants and witnesses will increase enormously. As Jonathan Ripman of the Law Society for Suffolk and North East Essex has said in respect of Suffolk, "Here we go again." As I pointed out to the Minister, the county council is speaking out, but, as before, to no avail. Councillors are worried that, no matter what they do, their influence will be minimal. Susan Sida-Lockett, the Conservative group leader of Suffolk county council, has turned to her local government association for guidance. She has asked for a more clearly defined national policy and a set of criteria to prevent the consequences that we are discussing from arising.

I am sorry to say that, during the past few years, the Minister's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), who had to deal with closures in Suffolk, approved without exception closures up and down the country. I invest no particular blame in him, because the closures have been going on for some time; however, the problem is now becoming much worse. Therefore, we must consider new guidelines and a framework—for instance, an ideal ratio of courts to population, taking into account elements such as sparsity, transport, environmental effects and cost to the public purse. Of course the courts are not run for the convenience of court officials: they are run for the convenience of our local communities, who feel devastated by the loss.

I want to quote from the Magistrates Association itself. I have had a strong letter from John James of Dorset, who is its deputy chairman. He says:

"The Magistrates' Association believes that lay magistrates, supported by justices' clerks, are best placed to provide local justice in courts throughout England and Wales. The Magistrates' Association is extremely concerned that judicial functions are increasingly compromised for reasons of administrative expediency. This cannot be acceptable to the public or to court users. The Association recognises the need to balance good management and good quality justice but believes that the service is now close to the point where there are no more efficiency savings to be made without seriously harming its essential nature.

Magistrates' Courts Committees are required by statute to consult magistrates in the MCC area about matters which affect the provision of local justice and MCCs are required to appoint bench liaison representatives to assist in this process. The Association recognises that, in some instances, effective consultation is not taking place and would advocate the introduction of good practice guidance on the consultative process."

Finally, Mr James says:

"Local justice requires that all magistrates' courts are accessible both in terms of opening hours and travelling time for court users. Where it can be demonstrated that courts do provide an accessible and valuable service to the local community, the association will resist court closures which are solely on the grounds of administrative expediency."

Therefore, on many levels, rural England is under considerable pressure. As parliamentarians, we have a responsibility to observe what is going on in our communities and to make sure that, as we have the privilege of sitting here as Members of Parliament, we pass on to the generation ahead a viable, successful and workable criminal justice system in touch with the communities that we represent. I fear that if what is happening in magistrates courts continues, we as parliamentarians will rue the day that we allowed it to happen.

In conclusion, I appeal to the Minister. The present situation is serious and alarming and continues to deteriorate. We must seriously consider creating a proper framework to carry out the responsibility of MCCs, particularly in rural areas. There must be more accountability than there is at present and some responsibility to the future of local communities that are increasingly under threat as their institutions are closed down. The criminal justice system, going back to the magna carta, is part and parcel of the viability of those communities. I appeal to the Minister to find ways of reversing the present trend and restoring the magistrates' courts system to its proper place.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): On the first occasion that I spoke in a Standing Committee under your chairmanship, Madam Deputy Speaker, you suggested—in a way in which only you can, sotto voce—that I speak up. I am struggling this morning, and I hope that the parliamentary broadcasting unit will be able to pick up my failing voice as I respond to this important debate. I am delighted to see you in the Chair, because I know that you take an interest in these issues.

I congratulate the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) on securing a debate on the important issue of the development of magistrates court services in rural districts. He made a most eloquent and interesting speech expressing the fears, genuinely felt in his constituency, that more changes to magistrates courts are in the pipeline there.

As the hon. Gentleman knows from earlier debates on the issue, magistrates courts are managed by locally based magistrates courts committees, which comprise local magistrates selected by a selection panel also made up of local magistrates. They conduct their business under the provisions of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, some of which have now been overtaken by the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. The Suffolk magistrates courts committee is responsible for the efficient and effective administration of the courts in its area. That committee, in consultation with the relevant paying authority—in this case, Suffolk county council—determines how many courthouses, and other accommodation, urban or rural, are needed locally.

It is sensible and rational that these reviews are taking place, and we expect no less of the magistrates courts committees in fulfilling their responsibilities. They must decide the most efficient way in which to discharge their statutory duty. However, it is not true to say that no guidance is issued to those committees. The central council of magistrates courts committees issues good practice guidance on courthouse closures. The Government encourage magistrates courts committees to follow that guidance. As the hon. Gentleman said, the magistrates courts committee has no plans to close further courthouses in Suffolk, so he can be reassured on that point.

Since the hon. Gentleman secured a debate on this subject in 1998, five courthouses have been allowed to close, as he has described. At that time, he warned the House that that would be the end of judicial life as we knew it in Suffolk. That has not happened. The performance in the Suffolk magistrates courts committee's area has improved. The average time for first listing to completion of a case has improved from 33 days in June 1998 to 32 days in June 1999. The published figures for monitoring the prosecution of persistent young offenders covering the first six months of 1999 show that the average time from the arrest to sentence for persistent young offenders in Suffolk was 130 days. That compares favourably with 154 days for Suffolk in 1997.

Furthermore, there have not been the difficulties that the hon. Gentleman predicted in recruiting suitable magistrates after the courthouse closures in 1998. There have been no adverse comments from court users resulting from the closures. Cases have not had to be relisted as a result of prosecution or defence witnesses failing to turn up at the new venues. This further points to the fact that the magistrates courts committee behaved responsibly in determining its courtroom needs.

I will say a few words about local justice. The essential feature of local justice is that magistrates live or work in the locality. It is not simply a question of the location of the delivery of justice. It is not an essential feature of local justice that each community will have its own courthouse. Magistrates courts committees need to balance the need for a locally delivered service with the need to improve the quality of that service within the resources that are available to them. They are also, mindful of the Government's aim of reducing delay, providing the optimum number of courtrooms in their area, permitting the flexible listing of cases.

Mr. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): I declare an interest as a life member of the Magistrates Association. Does the Parliamentary Secretary agree that it is difficult to provide that level of service, given that magistrates courts committees are so unevenly funded? That puts pressure on the committees, including my own in Leicestershire.

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend makes a point about the funding formula. That is currently being reviewed; a new formula is being prepared in consultation with the magistrates courts committees. We expect that that will deal with some of the problems that are being experienced in some localities.

It is important to reduce delays and focus on the needs of court users. The pressure to reduce delays in court comes from victims, witnesses and defendants—that is, the most important court users. Court users are primarily concerned about their case being heard on the day that it is listed.

I understand the attachment that many people have to the court system as it has grown up over the centuries. However, we must consider how the service can be modernised in line with the way in which people live now and the power and potential of information technology and modern communications. Nowadays, much of the business of the criminal courts does not have to be conducted face to face. For example, there is no technical—as opposed to legal—reason why fines have to be paid locally in person. They could be paid by post, by telephone or, eventually, electronically. Preliminary and administrative hearings could be conducted using video and audio conferencing methods, which are currently being developed.

Even the trial, the core of criminal proceedings, is changing. Children and other vulnerable witnesses can give evidence by video link, and information technology is transforming the way in which evidence can be presented to courts. Lord Justice Auld's review, which has recently been announced, will address many of those questions and offer ideas as to how we might change the criminal court system to make it fit for the 21st century.

Information technology can also improve the efficiency of the courts and the justice system. For example, we are aiming to reduce the incidence of adjournments, and the time wasted by court users, that is caused by the lack of information available to the court. The strategic IT plans of the major criminal justice agencies include the electronic transfer of information between agencies—for example, the provision of case information from the police to the court in time for the hearing, or the fast and efficient communication of results from the court to the police and the Crown Prosecution Service. That will provide more timely and complete information for the courts. We intend to introduce a new system for the magistrates court that will include such inter-agency links. The hon. Member for West Suffolk will be pleased to learn that when implementation of the system begins in the summer of next year, Suffolk will be the first magistrates courts committee to take the new system.

Let us not forget that magistrates are an essential and valuable part of the service. If they are to gain much more full and varied experience, and fulfil their sitting hours, it is better for work to be concentrated in larger, more efficient courts.

As I said, court users want to be sure that their case will be heard on the date it is listed, without too much waiting on the day. Larger courts with good facilities are more likely to be able to provide that level of service, because there is much more flexibility in using the courtroom accommodation. Transferring the workload of magistrates courts committees to better equipped centres is one way to modernise and improve the overall service that they provide. Their local knowledge means that they are best placed to make judgments on the best use of their resources.

I can only repeat that the Government are committed to providing a modern system of justice with well-equipped and secure courtrooms. We are committed to reducing delay in the time taken for cases to proceed through the courts and so to achieve our aim of reducing delay in the criminal justice system. We must all look to the future and the different ways of working that the new century will bring.

Confectionery Safety

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise this important issue and to reflect the concerns of medical and safety experts and, not least, the families whose children have suffered because of the intrinsic dangers of sweets containing toys or small objects in component form. In so doing, I pay tribute to all who have campaigned for so long to bring the matter to the attention of the Government, the industry and the general public. In particular, I should like to mention the activities of constituents and others who have drawn the subject to my attention and taken the time and effort to brief me so carefully.

I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), and other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) and the hon. Member for West Tyrone (Mr. Thompson), who have raised concerns about the implication of the sale of those products. Some of them have direct knowledge of the sad events surrounding the death of their constituents' children. Recently, Lord Colwyn, an eminent physician, has made known his concern. I hope that he will not mind my quoting from his letter to the Secretary of State for Health in which he stated:

"Professional colleagues have recently alerted me to their concerns over the risk to young children's health posed by small chocolate eggs which contain toys in component form. I am aware of three fatalities and of other serious incidents and am concerned that the Government has not alerted consumers to the risks associated with these products.

I am even more surprised that last Autumn's DTI report on choking—based on A&E data, claims" not to have identified as many incidents as would seem to be the case. He continued:

"Do we not owe it to the parents who have suffered so much, and to all those children who could be tempted to put these small objects in their mouths" to take up the issue and

"to encourage or require manufacturers to produce safer products with enclosures which cannot be swallowed or inhaled."

I wish to bring to your attention today, Madam Deputy Speaker, the history of choking incidents in this country and elsewhere in Europe, which are well documented and some of which have resulted in fatalities. Feeling is now so strong that some countries in Europe have introduced restrictions on the sale of the sweets and others are considering doing so. They have been banned in the United States on safety grounds for many years. I ask whether we are doing enough in this country to draw attention to the dangers of the sweets, whether we should seek a tougher regulatory framework based on more explicit knowledge of what has transpired, and how we should monitor and record incidents of children who are taken to accident and emergency departments after swallowing embedded objects.

What we are discussing can best be demonstrated by holding up an example of the Kinder Surprise egg, which is on sale in almost every sweet shop, supermarket and garage. Each egg contains a small toy inside a plastic capsule. They are, understandably, very popular with young children. Not only is there the natural attraction of the chocolate, but the object within it is equally responsible for their popularity with children and makes the products more attractive than ever. That may not be a problem with older children, but the products are also aimed at very young children who do not know that they should not put the objects in their mouths. Retailers have seen children open the eggs with their teeth. The toy inside most of the products is in very small pieces and easy to swallow and, in the view of the country's leading experts, can easily cause a child to choke. Is this not, both in theory and in practice, very dangerous? If, as I believe, it is dangerous, we as adults should, by adopting a precautionary principle, draw attention to these products and seek to regulate them more carefully, in the hope that they are withdrawn from sale or that much improved alternatives are introduced to replace them.

I am particulary keen, as I said, to highlight the role of the accident and emergency units, as they handled all the heart-rending stories that I want to refer to. I in no way criticise their fine work, but the Department of Trade and Industry has always claimed that the home accident surveillance system, which depends on returns by A and E departments, is as accurate as possible. However, many campaigners feel that cases sometimes go unreported.

The three cases where fatalities occurred have now been well documented and reported. Jennifer Ashton from Birmingham choked on part of a Kinder egg. She was three, and I know her mother is here today. Roddy Breslin from Omagh died after putting the capsule from a Kinder egg in his mouth. He was three. Caren Day from Sheffield died choking on parts of a Chupa Chups egg. She was four. So that you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, how strongly these families feel about the issue, I shall quote from the letter sent to me by Mrs. Ashton. She said:

"We are so grateful that someone in parliament is finally trying to do something about the killer sweets that are available everywhere you look.

As you know our little girl, Jenny, choked to death on a little bit of a plastic toy in a Kinder Surprise egg. It was a long time ago, but in all these years nobody has taken any notice until now. Three children have died in this country and all we hear is that millions and millions of eggs are eaten without anyone coming to harm. If another child dies this won't be much consolation to the parents. Please do your best to make sure that no other family loses a little one."

That is the clearest and starkest evidence of the problems that can be caused by these sweets. Unfortunately, they and similar sweets are still on sale today. To its credit, Nestlé withdrew its product following safety concerns, and other manufacturers have either refused to sell such items or have produced better alternatives, as I hope to explain. Clearly, there has been a sustained and vigorous campaign to draw attention to what is wrong by, among others, the Consumers Association and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents.

Manufacturers who continue to sell such sweets react by claiming that they warn children by printing safety warnings on the wrapper. However, children as young as two or three will not be able to read, let alone understand, what the wrappers are saying. Indeed, there is an argument that such wrappers fail the Department of Trade and Industry's 1990 guidelines on safety labelling. It is claimed that millions of eggs are sold each year, yet there have been only three "incidents" in recent times. I call a death something more than an incident: one is one too many if we can avoid this risk.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): My hon. Friend is to be congratulated on raising this issue again before the House. He refers to RoSPA's interest in the case. I understand that RoSPA believes that the Department of Trade and Industry accident reporting system significantly under-reports such incidents. Will my hon. Friend also comment on the views of Professor David Jenkins, the product safety consultant to RoSPA? He says:

"For example, high consequence risks (e.g. death) associated with exposure to hazards for purely frivolous purposes, even of low probability, should normally indicate that the product be abandoned."

Would my hon. Friend therefore not consider it a matter for disquiet if Government officials were to drag their feet on support for European Union directives to improve product safety in this respect and did not take into account the severe and tragic cases to which he refers?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, Interventions must be brief.

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. As I build the case, I shall concur with his arguments, perhaps using evidence from different people.

I shall go through each of my four arguments quickly, because of the time. First, I want to look at what has been happening in Europe and consider the implications for us in the United Kingdom. It is fair to say that there has been a flurry of activity in recent times. As I have said, such products have long been banned in the United States, where any adulterated food is unacceptable. An interesting aside is the way in which the American authorities reacted to the Nestlé product, which was introduced in the early 1990s in the form of a chocolate magic ball with a toy inside it. After the threat of legal action, Nestlé withdrew the product from the marketplace in 1997 and subsequently removed it from all European countries, including the UK. Comparisons identify the marked difference in attitude between the United States and Europe, but, as a result of new investigation and re-examination of incident levels, there is now a shift in emphasis here.

Research from Professor Petridou of Athens university suggested that there could be as many as 2,000 choking accidents annually in Europe. I am not alleging that all are serious, let alone fatal. However, that is a staggering and worrying figure. Subsequent research by the Humboldt university in Berlin suggested that the problem was significant. Of 34 serious cases of choking reported in German hospitals or children's clinics, 31 were from these types of egg.

As a result of unease, other European Governments have started to take action. In Greece, the Ministry of Commerce produced a law protecting children as consumers with an article 10, which prevents the placing of an inedible item within foodstuffs. Portugal and Belgium are following in train. The French have also launched a major investigation into the safety of foods containing inedibles.

There is a move towards increased control at EU level. I speak in glowing terms of the work of the MEP, Phillip Whitehead, who presented a petition to the European Parliament on behalf of the parents of the children who died. The Commission has now drawn attention to the dangers of these products and invited member states to take appropriate action to restrict their circulation in the interests of safety. There is an obligation under directive 92/59/EEC to take all necessary measures to guarantee that all products put on the market are safe, and there is also directive 88/378/EEC on the safety of toys, including the proscription of certain unsuitable ones for under-threes. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade will be aware of the strong press campaign in this country and abroad to highlight the dangers from these products and to urge Governments to take appropriate action.

May I deal briefly with the accusation that I am over-reacting and advocating a nanny state approach. My response is simple. All the statistics demonstrate that children have choked on coins, pen tops, keys and ring pulls as well as a variety of other objects over recent times, but the difference is that those are accidents, whereas these sweets knowingly encourage children to place the object in their mouth. Obviously I do not allege that manufaturers want children to choke—that would be irresponsible and unfair—but it is pernicious to take risks with children which can and should be avoided. The issue is black and white, and the case for safety is irrefutable.

I wish to deal with the manufacturers' response. In a nutshell, those who continue to sell these items have taken two approaches. First, they refute the dangers, arguing that out of billions of eggs sold over the years, only an infinitesimal number of incidents have occurred. Secondly, where problems did arise, without accepting liability they changed the design and posted clearer warnings. They have nevertheless been rather impervious to the criticisms of those campaigning against the products.

I do not want to dwell on it, but, rather than admitting responsibility, there has been a marked reluctance to accept any blame by some manufacturers. Worse, I have evidence that Ferrero Ltd., the owner of Kinder Surprise eggs, have sought to avoid taking blame by refusing to acknowledge the rights of families, campaigners—and perhaps even the Government—to bring the issues into the public domain. I hope that today's debate will help to overcome that.

A press conference that was to have taken place at the House of Commons in March 1998, sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston—it is good to see her here—and by the hon. Member for West Tyrone was cancelled at the instigation of the Biscuit, Cake, Confectionary and Chocolate Alliance on the promise of objective research being undertaken. Unfortunately, nothing has transpired since that cancellation.

On the positive side, it is pleasing to say that Nestlé was not the only manufacturer which chose not to continue with similar products. I have with me a Cadbury's Yowie egg and hon. Members will immediately see the difference: it is a much bigger egg and it contains embedded materials in a much safer way—proof that other firms such as Cadbury's, which produces the Yowie egg, can deal with the issue and still keep a market share.

Lastly, there is the role of Government. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not mind if I briefly present what I take to be the Department's current position. I am sure that he will come back to me if I am wrong or if I parody it in any way. The DTI claims that product safety regulations offer adequate protection despite the fact that the Institute of Trading Standards Administration, whose members wanted to get these products suspended after the death of Jennifer Ashton, said that the law is unenforceable. It believes that there is insufficient evidence. Referring to the survey on the home accident surveillance system data, it saw more of a threat from other items that children choke upon, as has already been mentioned, some of which may be passed on by older siblings.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) said in an answer to Phillip Whitehead:

"I would of course be very concerned if there was conclusive evidence that toys sold inside chocolate eggs posed a greater danger to young children because of the way they are sold than other small toys. However, the information currently available to DTI does not suggest that this is the case. This is very much in line with the consensus of views expressed by the European Commission and member States in mid-1998 when this issue was discussed. The conclusion then was that there was no need for controls, additional to those provided by the toys safety Directive and the General Product Safety Directive, on non-food items sold with food products where they were clearly separated—as is the case with products of the Kinder Surprise type."

I take issue with that because clearly there is a need to reinvestigate the matter even if we do not take precipitate action at this time.

I have read the report commissioned by the DTI entitled "Choking Risks to Children". This undertakes a study not just of HASS, but of the leisure accidents surveillance system, and includes evidence from the home accidents deaths database. In downgrading the threat there was none the less recognition that redesigning the cylinders and extending the present regulations would reduce the number of accidents. I hope that my hon. Friend will not mind my saying that there was concern at exactly what was being recorded and analysed. I ask him together with his Department of Health colleagues to re-examine the mechanism for recording to make sure that all results are obtained and in sufficient detail to ensure that we get an accurate picture. I am aware that that puts additional responsibilities on accident and emergency departments, but this is such an important issue that it must be got right.

In conclusion, I ask for five issues to be addressed by the Minister of Trade today. First, will the Government launch a campaign to warn parents about the intrinsic dangers in buying small eggs and similar confectionery products? Larger capsules and one-piece toys are much safer. Secondly, will they require manufacturers to increase the size of the capsule so that it cannot be swallowed? Small parts that fail to meet that requirement should be banned. Thirdly, will they recognise that the precedent was set with the action to deal with the problem of pen tops? This issue requires similar urgent action. Fourthly, will they consider making manufacturers package toys separately so that their container does not entice children to put them in their mouths because of the smell of chocolate? Lastly, will they work with EU partners to ensure that action taken can be enforced across the Community, building on existing directives? If that is achieved, further lives will not be lost and we will at least have proved that lessons have been learnt.

The Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Richard Caborn): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on being selected for this short, private Member's debate. As usual, he has made a thought-provoking speech. I listened carefully to the many important points he made and there were more than I can hope to address in the relatively short period remaining. I therefore want to invite my hon. Friend and those who have campaigned with him to come and sit down with my officials so that the issues can receive proper attention. Quite a lot of information that has been given to the House today deserves further attention.

My hon. Friend also referred to concerns in the European Union and to action proposed and taken by other European countries. These issues have been raised in Europe recently, although the Commission concluded that, on current evidence, there was no concern about the safety of those types of products. Therefore, I would greatly welcome any evidence and statistics that the group could bring to the meeting that I have proposed. I hope that my suggestion will be taken up. After our Department's review of any evidence, we shall ensure that it is passed on to the European Commission.

Before coming to the specific issue of the safety of toys and small objects in confectionery, I will say a few words about toy safety in general. Obviously we are considering the safety of extremely vulnerable consumers—children. What is less obvious and less easy to assess is how best to ensure their safety. Children develop and learn through exploration, and their age and lack of experience makes them fearless when a little fear could do some good. It is the responsibility of adults to ensure that children's environment is such that exploration is as hazard-free as possible, because childhood is not a risk-free experience. It is not easy to draw the line to ensure that children are as safe as possible without putting undue restrictions on their opportunities to explore, learn and have fun. Views on how that line should be drawn differ among parents and carers alike.

We need to consider the issues against the background of small toys in confectionery. As my hon. Friend said, chocolate eggs sometimes contain toys. Indeed they are probably the most well-known example in the United Kingdom of confectionery containing toys. The eggs generally contain a plastic capsule, although in one instance the capsule itself was chocolate-coated. In fact, the capsule is wholly separate—detached—from the chocolate egg. The capsule holds various small plastic pieces which, when assembled, make up the toy. The toy, like all toys sold in the UK, must comply with the stringent requirements of the Toy Safety Regulations 1995. Such toys have small parts, so, in accordance with the regulations, the product is labelled to indicate that is unsuitable for children under three.

[Mr. Richard Caborn]

I will give a little more of the background to the regulating of safety in this area. The toy regulations state that toys and their component parts, and any detachable parts of them, must, if intended for use by children under 36 months, be of such dimensions as to prevent their being swallowed or inhaled. Toys and their parts and packaging must not contain a risk of suffocation or strangulation. Toys that might be dangerous to children under the age of 36 months must, unless manifestly unsuitable for small children, bear a warning that they are not suitable for them.

The European toy standard EN71, which is published in the UK as a British standard, contains a cylinder test, as my hon. Friend said. Any toy or detachable part that is in the cylinder could pose a choking hazard for young children, and must not be included in toys for children under three.

In considering the issue during the long time that it has been under discussion, it has struck me that people often begin from the assumption that the way in which the toy is supplied—that is to say, with chocolate—increases the risk to children. Is this so? I question that assumption and suggest that a better approach would be to consider it on a case-by-case basis.

In the United Kingdom, three children have died in the past 15 years in incidents involving chocolate eggs: two two-year-olds choked on small parts in the toy and a four-year-old suffocated on the capsule—three too many deaths. They rightly prompted a searching look at the policy on such toys. In addressing that, we must examine how these tragic events occurred, to enable us to prevent such deaths in future. We must consider to what extent the presence, or absence, of the confectionery was material to the accidents, and whether they would have been avoided if the original packaging had been more conventional.

Some might argue that a child could inadvertently swallow the contents of the egg while eating the edible parts, unaware of the presence of the contents. However, in the case of products such as chocolate eggs, that would be highly unlikely. The popularity of those products lies precisely in the toy surprise content. The cost of the product reflects the additional value over a simple chocolate egg, highlighting the dual purpose of the product at the point of purchase. Children will be aware of, and actively looking for, the contents. And there is no evidence to support the assertion that the smell of chocolate migrates to the toy, so that the child believes that it, too, is chocolate and so puts it in his mouth.

Choking hazards are an important safety consideration and the DTI has undertaken research on choking incidents involving small children. That research provides no evidence to suggest that toys marketed in this way pose a greater risk to children than other toys, a view shared by the European Commission, which looks at the adequacy of safety measures in Europe.

If, as the evidence suggests, safety risks arise from the nature of the toy itself, we must treat the toy—whether it comes from a chocolate egg, a cracker or from conventional wrapping—in the same manner. Children will not make the distinction and nor should we. If a toy sold in a chocolate egg presents no greater choking hazard than toys of a similar size sold by toy manufacturers, it should be subject to the same requirements. If there is a problem, it needs to be addressed for all small toys, not just those sold with confectionery.

The younger the child, the greater the risk from choking. Children under three are at greatest risk since their coughing and swallowing reflexes are less well developed. Indeed, the statistics show that choking incidents diminish significantly for the over-threes. The vulnerability of a child under three is exacerbated by the fact that small children are most likely to put things in their mouth. In particular, children under 12 months, when sight and touch is not so well developed, will learn about objects in their environment by "feeling" them in their mouths.

Many small objects, of which small toys are only a tiny category, present a potential choking hazard to small children. Young children will put or attempt to put anything and everything in their mouth. Unfortunately, as I have mentioned, these young children are least able to deal with any items that they may accidentally inhale. Parents and carers in this country are well aware—not least because of the reinforced message required by our regulations—that small children should not be left alone with small objects, whether toys or other items, nearby. Of course, it must be recognised that once small toys and toys with small parts are brought into the home for older children, there is a possibility that they might get into the hands of younger siblings, which must be guarded against.

The brand leader in the UK toy confectionery market has been on the market since 1973. Since 1972, it has sold 19 billion eggs worldwide. In the year to the end of August 1999, total sales in Europe were 1.3 billion. In the UK, 51 million were sold that year. There is no doubt that such products are in demand and are extremely popular. They bring pleasure to many children each year.

The DTI has been aware of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud, and has kept the issue under review for some time. It has looked at the circumstances of choking injuries and deaths involving toys and children under four and has considered information published in various papers. Most recently, it has commissioned research on accident data collected by the United Kingdom's home accident surveillance and home accident death databases. The outcome of that research on choking hazards establishes that the main causes of choking in under-threes are sweets, coins and food. The most recent statistics available indicate that around 6 per cent. of non-fatal choking incidents and around 4 per cent. of fatal incidents involve toys. The most common toys that cause choking are small parts from construction kits, games, soft toys and marbles. The European Commission has considered the issue on several occasions and also concluded that there are few data to suggest a problem.

Although it has been stated in some quarters that such toys sold with confectionery have been involved in seven deaths, inquiries by the DTI have not been able to confirm that figure and it is aware of three deaths. It has been suggested in the past that information on choking incidents had not been collected accurately. I want to be certain about the statistics. We shall go through them again at the meeting. If a responsible organisation such as RoSPA challenges them, I want to ensure that the data are accepted by all parties to the discussion.

I know that I have not been able to cover all the ground in the short time available. I should like to invite my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud and people in the campaign to the Department to sit round the table with my officials, who are more than willing to share all the evidence. We do not want another death, but we must also ensure that we do not inhibit young people from learning and developing their character.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at One o'clock.

School League Tables

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Clelland.]

9.56 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), it might be helpful if I explain what the consequences are of the parallel sitting of the two Chambers. In Westminster Hall, it is Wednesday, and under the Standing Orders of the House our debates will continue according to their allotted time span. However, the Standing Orders are equally firm that we must finish at 2 o'clock, so there will be a fairly large fallout relating to the last scheduled debate. None the less, the debate on which we are about to embark will receive its full allotted time of one and a half hours, even if it is further interrupted. That is the knock-on effect, which is obviously something that might have be to reconsidered when these matters are further examined, but those are the Standing Orders that govern our proceedings at the moment. Without wasting any more time, we should proceed to use the time available as best we can.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): In view of the exhausting events of yesterday evening—or is it this morning?—I am pleased that so many hon. Members have come to listen to, or participate in, today's debate.

I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate a debate on league tables—I use the term "league tables" rather than "performance tables" because the terminology draws attention to some of the issues that I wish to highlight. I draw the attention of the Chamber to the increasing concerns of parents, schools and many hon. Members about the way in which the existing league table system functions. I shall comment on the moves towards a value-added system, and suggest other methods by which the performance of schools could be made clearer to parents, local authorities and government.

It is several years now since the annual publication of league tables was introduced and, for many people, its full implications have begun to sink in as each year has gone by. I must confess that I am obsessively interested in league tables. I find them compulsive, as I am sure many hon. Members do, and I spend many hours poring over them. Having said that, I believe that the current system, which we inherited, is indefensible because of its damaging consequences for many schools and because league tables do not represent the full range of achievements of individual schools.

Over the past few years, it has been difficult to question league tables. In many respects, it has been assumed that if one questioned league tables, one was also questioning the whole national curriculum, the testing regime and other issues established by the Education Reform Act 1988 and, more recently, the drive to improve standards that was consolidated in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998. Therefore, I want to say at the outset that this debate is not a call for the abolition of league tables, but a call for a review of their purpose and presentation. It is certainly not a criticism of the national curriculum or the testing regime. My only comment about that is that I am constantly amazed that it took state education about 125 years to put such a system in place. I acknowledge that, each year, this Government and the previous Government have made slight improvements to the presentation of league tables, which has helped to set the context a little better. I certainly welcome the Government's attempts to introduce value-added measures in due course, and I acknowledge the continuing work that is being done on that.

It is not that I represent a constituency in which the schools en bloc have a grievance about league tables. Neither the schools in my constituency nor the local authority has any grievances about league tables because schools in Bury, especially in Bury, North, perform extremely well under the existing conventional criteria of publishing test results. I am fortunate to have an efficient and progressive local education authority in Bury which, some months ago, received an outstanding Ofsted report describing it as delivering school improvement and high standards without "fuss or rhetoric". I hope that our debate will also be without fuss or rhetoric. Bury primary schools have been in the top 10 for the past three years at key stage 2, which is an exceptional performance. They were ranked eighth in 1998 and seventh in 1999. Until I pored over the national league tables again, I did not realise that our primary schools are second in the table on gender gaps in English. That means that boys in Bury perform almost as well as girls in English, which is not the case in most of the country.

We are always ahead of our statistical neighbours in primary education and we compare with districts that represent some of the most affluent parts of the country. Only the LEAs of the Isles of Scilly, City of London, Richmond upon Thames, Wokingham, Rutland and Surrey perform better than Bury which, in terms of socio-economic indicators, is a middling district at key stage 2. In 1999, I was fortunate to be able to use an Adjournment debate to praise the achievements of primary schools in Bury.

Last year, our secondary schools were in the top 25 at GCSE level and we achieved the best increase in performance with the exception of Rutland, for which there were exceptional circumstances. Our GCSE results increased from 47.7 to 53.5 per cent. I shall avoid the temptation to list the many exceptional results of individual schools in Bury. We are confident in Bury that our schools will continue to perform well when we move towards value-added measures. Although I do not want to digress, I must stress that Bury schools deliver those results with a level of funding that is in the bottom 20 of all LEAs, even though our indicators of deprivation put us in the middle. However, I shall not go into area cost adjustment and standard spending assessments. Instead, I shall discuss the problems of the system and why people are increasingly dissatisfied with what we inherited from the previous Government.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

When the league table system was established, there was a confusion of purpose. Some people argued that league tables would provide parents with greater freedom of information, but of course the information that was provided more freely was selective; it was simple test results. Some people argued that they would provide better information for teachers so that they could monitor children's progress more effectively. Some people argued that they would give an incentive to schools that were performing less well. That reflected the newly emerging market in schools in which competition would drive up achievement in all schools. Those schools that could not compete would decline, lose pupils and go out of business. Some people argued that league tables would provide comparative indicators that would be useful in extending models of good practice from school to school and local authority to local authority.

In recent years, league tables have been used for all those purposes, which are not always mutually compatible. The instrument that might best increase parental choice is not necessarily the instrument that works to drive up standards for all children. There is a complex interrelationship between the needs, which I support, of interested parties. There is a need to allow parents and the wider community access to freedom of information; to provide parental choice; to monitor progress and set targets within individual schools; and to reflect the importance of national policies for driving up standards of achievement.

We have not always been clear about the primary purpose of league tables. We have sometimes been obsessed with making league tables the sole indicator of quality at the expense of alternative methodologies for raising standards in schools. We have put our schools in a framework with good schools at the top, less good schools that are aspiring to be good schools in the middle, and failing schools at the bottom. Schools as institutions—the process of teaching and learning—cannot be reduced to that simplified model. The system provides an enormous amount of invaluable raw statistics, which are fascinating for people who love to pore over such information, but they can have a devastating effect on individual schools and communities.

Although some schools, including many in my constituency, look forward to the publication of league tables with great pleasure, because they know that their excellent exam performance will be recognised, for a large minority of schools and LEAs, that serves to reinforce not just their sense of inferiority but the hopelessness of their predicament. They cannot aspire to the top of the league table under a system that simply measures output. Thousands of schools serve less affluent communities, which are not always in inner cities. They cannot get to the top of the league table because of the community that they serve. They know—every hon. Member will have constituency examples of this—that, every time league tables are published, the comparison between schools becomes sharper. Schools in more difficult areas become conscious of the comparison between their neighbours in more affluent areas and a great number of parents become aware of that comparison. As a result, the number of pupils on the school roll declines the following year. That reduces the budgets of those schools further, which makes it more difficult to deliver the necessary improvements. I shall not go into the recent well-publicised and spectacular examples of such schools, but we all have less well-publicised examples in our constituencies.

The operation of league tables has helped to drive up standards in many schools because of the incentive that is provided by competition, but it has often served to widen the differentials between schools and, ultimately, weaken the comprehensive principle and system in primary and secondary schools. Parents have understandably exercised their freedom of choice to examine the newly available selective information about school performance. They have exercised that freedom of choice with a vengence and the education of hundreds of thousands of children in hundreds, if not thousands, of schools has suffered as a result. Parents cannot exercise their freedom of choice in schools in less affluent areas because they are not socially mobile, they are constrained by geography and they lack financial resources. Those schools cannot succeed in the current system. We have allowed ourselves to be locked into the thinking behind the fatuous concept that schools are like football teams and can be measured only by their position in a league table.

I want to draw attention to specific problems with the system. First, it purely measures output; it makes no reference to input. Every year, I look at the league tables and the schools in my constituency and I know which schools will be towards the top and which will be towards the bottom. I know, too, that the league tables for primary and secondary schools in my constituency reflect not the broad quality of individual schools, but the social structure of the constituency. The league tables are a description of geography, of population and of social class, not of a school's achievement.

Secondly, there is a spiral of decline for schools with poor catchment areas. As more parents exercise their freedom of choice, strong schools get stronger and weaker schools get weaker, to the point at which intervention is needed. Either the weaker schools become failing schools and there is official intervention from the centre, or there is a spectacular collapse, as there has been in schools in some parts of the country, or there is a more subtle intervention, which involves a huge injection of cash, which is far more expensive than it would have been if the problem had been solved earlier.

We must consider the statistical significance of the comparatively small difference in raw scores. We deal with it in one sense, in that small primary schools with fewer than 10 or 11 pupils who are eligible for key stage 2 tests, for example, do not appear on the league tables; but many schools have 12 pupils eligible for the test. A slight variation in that figure because of the illness of one or two children on the day of the test can have a significant impact on the percentage figure.

In the league tables overall, the GCSE scores in Bury last year were, as I said, exceptional. It was the best improvement on the previous year in the country. Is our score of 53.5 per cent. gaining five A to C passes significantly worse than one of our neighbours with 53.7 per cent? I suspect that it is not. I suspect that some of the issues that determine those figures are the policies on exclusions and on entering pupils for exams, which vary widely between schools.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I strongly support the Government's policy of inclusion of special needs children, but does he accept that, if a class has one or two special needs children with severe learning difficulties, for example, a school that has made an effort to include those children could go from the top of the league table to the bottom for no reason other than it had complied with Government policy and parental wishes?

Mr. Chaytor: I was about to come to exactly the point that the hon. Gentleman has made so well. When we consider the impact of special needs children, it is just a matter not of looking at the effect of statemented children in mainstream schools, but of considering how special schools feel when the league tables are published. Special schools are completely wiped out of the picture.

One of the Government's most urget priorities should be the role of special schools, an example of which is Elms Bank school in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), which serves all children in Bury. My hon. Friend and I visited that school recently; we are conscious of its enormous achievements. It has a wide range of children with different special needs. The school has worked very hard to establish a system of certificates of achievement for 16 and 18-year-olds, but they appear nowhere in the national league tables. There is a huge amount of added value in special schools and for children with special needs in mainstream schools, but that is not recognised anywhere. The effect of that lack of recognition is to marginalise the issue of special needs children.

I shall focus on the impact of choosing to highlight five A to C grades at GCSE. We know that five A to C grades are chosen because it is the admission ticket to A-levels, but its impact is that any other achievement at GCSE is seen as a failure. When the GCSE was established, the idea was to get away from the old divide between O-levels and the certificate of secondary education, one exam being considered less relevant and prestigious than the other. The difficulty in focusing on A to C grades is that there may be some evidence that borderline children receive more attention—logically, in terms of the approach of individual schools—in order to push children who are functioning at about grade D to get a grade C, at the expense of children who achieve less well. The children who score Es, Fs and Gs may thus be at risk.

I highlight a slight contradiction in the Secretary of State's speech at the North of England conference in which he argued strongly for a restructuring of the curriculum so that post-14 there would be greater attention on vocational achievements, a much closer link between schools and the workplace, and more work-based training for children still at school. That is absolutely the right direction in which to go, but that new area of achievement is completely ignored by the current system, which focuses on the need to gain the admission ticket to A-levels—they will always be for only a small minority—and, ultimately, on the demands of the universities. We must consider children's achievements across the board, across the range of ability.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I differ with part of what my hon. Friend said. League tables have to show the numbers who are not entered for GCSE, or who get one GCSE or fewer. The Ofsted inspectors at the school where I taught, and the local press, focused on that aspect as much as they focused on the five A to C grades. Is my hon. Friend therefore arguing about how we can ensure that that is given equal worth and attention? It is there in the league tables.

Mr. Chaytor: I agree with my hon. Friend: it is there in the league tables, and that is welcome. My hon. Friend has a sympathetic local press if the total number of GCSE passes gets the same attention as the number of five A to C passes. Schools in my local authority have an exceptional performance in terms of total GCSE passes, with only 2.2 per cent. of children not getting a single GCSE. That record is one of the best in the country. I take my hon. Friend's point that it is in the league tables; that is welcome, but it does not have the same status, and that is the problem. As Government policy moves towards giving greater emphasis to young people who will not achieve five A to Cs at GCSE we need to reconsider the issue.

I want to highlight another anomaly in the system to give a flavour of some of the problems. We now have the results at 18-plus—the A-level points scores—as well as at 16-plus. The published tables list the individual institutions; there is also an A-level points score for each local authority. In many parts of the country—arguably, in most parts of the country—A-level students are not entirely the responsibility of the local authority. The tables are misleading insofar as further education and sixth form colleges educate increasing numbers of A-level students. Many of those institutions do a superb job, yet the results appear in the tables as the collective achievement of the local authority, when it is nothing to do with the local authority.

I have drawn attention to my specific concerns, which are shared by many people. I welcome the fact that the Government are committed to introducing value-added measures. It is self-evident that school should be not about simply producing good results for children who are already performing well when they enter the school, but about adding value to each pupil's individual achievement and bringing out his or her full potential.

The added value debate is a paradise for acronym lovers. Acronyms include ALIS, YELLIS, PIPS, MIDYIS and QUASE. Most schools now use one of those systems or a variant. We are beginning to understand the significance of the value added system, and we recognise the complexities associated with establishing a foolproof methodology.

Since the publication in 1997 of the value added national project, there has been a lively debate about differing methodologies. Head teachers were unhappy about the Government's plans, and the intention is to adopt the individual pupil number system, which I hope will be implemented as soon as possible. I welcome that shift of focus, which will give a huge boost to schools in poorer areas which perform extremely well and bring out children's potential.

[Mr. Chaytor]

However, there will be limitations. The problem remains that, in most parts of the country—although perhaps not in Gedling—parents regard five A to Cs as the be-all and end-all. Non-national curriculum achievements in mainstream and special schools are not recognised. Moreover, there is the thorny issue of comparing like with like. Even an individual pupil number system that tracks children's progress from one year to the next, or one key stage to the next, may not enable us to make such a comparison. The communities that schools serve vary widely, as does the level of funding for schools. I again draw attention to the historic funding problems in my constituency and many others, and to the campaign of the special interest group of municipal authorities to change funding methodology, and that of the newly formed E40 group of local authorities for a national minimum level of funding for all children.

When we compare the fabric, resources, quality of materials and general environment of schools, we discover huge variations, which I am not sure even the new value added system will fully reflect. My feeling is that historically under-resourced schools that serve poorer areas will continue to appear near the bottom of the table.

With regard to 16-plus results, various factors come into play: the impact of the local education structure, be it 11 to 16 or 11 to 18; the number of schools that opted out under the previous regime, and thereby gained enormous financial advantage; and selection policy. There are no level playing fields for authorities or schools within authorities. Once the value added system is in place, the Goverment must consider what else needs to be done to reflect more accurately schools' achievements.

Regarding a school's league table position as a precise indicator of how bad or good it is in comparison with other schools is a gross over-simplification. The issue is far too complex to say that certain schools are good and others bad. A study of Hampshire schools was undertaken by Professor Goldstein of the Institute of Education. He concluded that it is impossible to categorise schools as good or bad. That contradicts the thinking of both this and the previous Government, the approach taken by the chief inspector of schools and the perception of parents. On the basis of his study, Professor Goldstein argued that, to a greater or lesser degree, different schools add greater or lesser value for children of differing abilities in different subjects. In other words, for most schools, there are things at which they are very good things at which they are merely good, things at which they are less good and things at which they are lousy. We are failing to reflect that variety and complexity.

We must ask ourselves what else is important about a school's performance. What other measures could appear in the annual performance statement? I am loth to use the phrase "performance tables" because it implies a rigid hierarchy and simplistic stratification. There is also the question of pastoral care. Schools that find it easy to attract able children at the age of 11 and produce good GCSE results in 16-year-olds and good A-level results in 18-year-olds provide hopeless pastoral care.

There is the general question of quality of leadership and its impact on teaching and learning, school morale, the sense of school loyalty and corporate identity. There is the further question of standards of behaviour, which are usually—but not always—related to performance. Moreover, there are the issues of the quality of governance, parental involvement, the range and richness of extra-curricular activities in sport, art, music and drama, the quality of teaching, the use of new technology, and teaching children to learn how to learn, rather than simply imparting facts.

Most indicators are published in an Ofsted report, which is rarely read in detail by parents. I wonder whether some judgments in such reports could be converted into simplified performance indicators that would provide a brief, broad and more accurate reflection of a school's range of achievements. Every teacher in the country would doubtless groan at the prospect of Ofsted having yet more influence on their activities and the according of greater significance to Ofsted reports, but I mention that merely as one example.

I would also draw an analogy with the further education sector. Since their incorporation, and since becoming subject to the Further Education Funding Council inspection regime, further education colleges have marketed themselves more ruthlessly than many schools. Colleges with achievements to boast about have published in their literature and in the press not only raw examination results but their FEFC inspection report gradings. I have some anxieties about such a marketing ploy, but it seems entirely reasonable to make available to parents a factual record of achievement.

There will always be some institutions that perform less well than others in respect of certain issues, and there is no point in concealing that fact. Freedom of information is essential and will help to drive up standards across the board, but the key question is: what information are we providing? In the past, we have provided highly selective information that focused exclusively on outputs and academic achievement in tests. We have ignored the entire range of other school achievements and the complexity of the education process.

I realise that I have spoken for a long time and that other hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. I should be grateful if the Minister would explain the Government's position on value added measures and tell us when they are likely to be introduced. I should also be interested to hear her observations on how we might go beyond the value added system. Is the system the end of the Government's thinking, or is there scope for a broader annual statement of school performance that would give due recognition to the qualities that make a successful school?

If we do not move in that direction, the same schools will appear year after year at the top of the league tables, and the same schools will appear at the bottom. The result will be demoralisation. I want a system that recognises the full range of achievement and abilities, and in which children with special needs are included. As the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) said, the way in which special schools and special needs children in mainstream schools have been treated is scandalous. Their remarkable achievements should be recognised nationally. We want a system that provides information for parents, management information for schools staff and information to support the Government's efforts to prise up standards. That is the priority. In not paying attention to these issues for many years, we have fallen behind, and I applaud the Government's attempts to put standards at the top of the agenda. As recently published league tables show, those attempts are bearing fruit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. Although the hon. Gentleman's speech was commendable, and a learning experience for us all, it was fairly lengthy. That reduces the time available to us. The agreed protocols of this Chamber are that the Opposition spokesman and the Minister are allowed the last 30 minutes of the debate. Therefore, I appeal to others who wish to contribute to make their points forcefully, clearly and as briefly as possible.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on an impressive tour d'horizon and on the gracious, non-partisan way in which he introduced his remarks.

I agree that the possibility of school league tables arises only because we have a national curriculum—a system of national testing. The hon. Gentleman put it well when he said that it was remarkable that it had taken about 120 years for such a system to be put in place—that was done by the previous Government. I also agree with him that under both the previous and the present Governments the league tables have evolved, improved and been refined. They are much better now than when they first appeared. I share his hope that, in five or 10 years' time, they will be considerably more useful, informative and fair than they are now.

I may take issue with one or two of the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but I want to adhere to your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to be brief, so that others can contribute. First, I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response to a question that a number of schools in my constituency—one in particular—have raised with me, which is the way in which those pupils fortunate, able or well enough taught to take GCSEs a year early are treated, or ignored, in the league tables. That problem needs to be dealt with more precisely. If one takes GCSEs in year 10, it does not count towards the figures for that school. Not only is there a distortion in the figures because those able pupils are taken out of the reckoning, but when they turn 16, a year later, they appear in the league tables as not having sat any GCSEs at all. That bias in the system needs to be tackled along with the many other issues mentioned by the hon. Member for Bury, North.

My second point concerns the availability of the league tables. We are all familiar with the newspaper educational supplements, which seem to have a large circulation. They are well used by parents, who seem to rely on them. However, we are living in an age of new technology. The league tables are made available on the internet, but I am not sure whether the Department has a clear strategy for using some of the search functions available. One can search within some of the other internet websites—for example, those dedicated to financial issues. One should be able to search not only for the name of a school but for particular categories. One should be able to take account of some of the value added characteristics once they are made available.

The technology can provide a great deal more information to parents than simply a printout of the details of the three or four schools in which they are interested. It should be possible to search geographically, by particular characteristics, or according to attendance or numbers of pupils not sitting examinations. I would be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about that and also about the progress that is being made towards the full exploitation of technology.

I am also interested in the Minister's clarification of the concept of value added. I have a slight difference of opinion with the hon. Member for Bury, North on that issue. The concept is important and I hope that progress can be made towards it. However, as the hon. Gentleman listed the many criteria that he would like to introduce under that heading, I became worried that the waters might become muddied. Far from providing clear information to parents, we might end up in a position in which no one understood the figures or the league tables, or we might return to the position of 10 or 20 years ago, when only the education professionals understood the data. We must guard against that happening.

As the hon. Gentleman said, we must also be clear that we are comparing apples with apples and oranges with oranges. We have been talking mainly about GCSEs, but the Government are now encouraging schools to look sympathetically at the provision of the baccalaureate alongside A levels. How will that be treated in the league tables? How are those apples and oranges to be compared? Can one compare them?

Finally, on the use to which the league tables are put, it is now common ground among hon. Members, across party divides, that the tables are a useful information tool for parents and that freedom of choice for parents, although it will always be limited and never perfect, is, none the less, an aim towards which we strive. League tables are a useful information tool in achieving that aim.

In that context, the practical implication of the Government's otherwise commendable policy of limiting class sizes at primary level has been that many parents who would otherwise have had a choice of primary school for their children have lost that choice. I am sure that other hon. Members have experienced this. Siblings are being separated. Families in my constituency are having to make long journeys to take their children to two different schools—often, in a rural community such as mine, the schools are many miles apart. If that problem persists up the age scale into secondary schools, it could have serious implications for parental choice. I would like to hear the Minister's response, because if parents are to have this information, they must have a real chance to use it.

I do not expect the Minister to respond to my final point, but my constituents would expect me to raise it. It is that school league tables have certain implications in an urban area, where schools are often close to one other and transport between one school and another is often not especially difficult. In rural areas such as mine, parents do not have much choice, especially of secondary schools. Until and unless the problems of rural school transport are properly and thoroughly tackled—which did not happen under the previous Government either—parents in rural areas will study the information in school league tables with interest but without a realistic expectation that it will influence their decision over which school to choose for their children.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby): I am grateful to be invited to speak in this debate and I should like to make a number of matters clear before I begin.

I have a daughter with a moderate to severe learning difficulty. She is now 12 years old. Everyone tells me that she is lovely. I am normally offered that information in a rather patronising way, because what is not normally said is that she is lovely but she will not amount to very much. I have far greater aspirations for my daughter than that. I am delighted by some of the measures that have already been implemented by the Government to recognise that people with special educational needs and with learning difficulties, of which there are a variety, have a right to exist and to be recognised in society.

The first major improvement was in the new deal programme when, suddenly, local authorities and employment services were being called to account about their efforts on behalf of people with learning difficulties. It is wonderful for parents with children in that position to think that someone, somewhere, will take note of them and try to assist them to be fully integrated into our society by virtue of employment. That was an excellent start because a group of people became identified through statistics. Statistics matter when, hitherto, one has not even been considered worthy of a statistic, or worthy of recognition in any formal sense.

I applauded the introduction of the White Paper "Excellence in schools", which was launched by the Department for Education and Employment in October 1997. That set out a programme for consideration by all those who have a vested interest in the development of children with special educational needs. It offered a wonderful blueprint that I, as a parent in that situation, very much welcomed. Commendably, the White Paper referred to target setting and national curriculum assessment qualifications. How are those activities, achievements and targets made manifest in the statistics? The short answer is that they are not. Achievements by special needs schools in relation to the White Paper have never been recorded in the league tables. I reiterate the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). They are not performance tables, but only league tables.

Problems are created in primary schools by the absence of those statistics. Every primary school accommodates children with a wide range of educational abilities, but some schools fight shy of taking children with special needs—that is as true in my constituency as in any other. If schools manage to accommodate such children, they move them on or omit them from standard assessment tests. Although that is unfortunate, we all understand why it happens. It is primarily driven by concern about the likely impact of those children on league tables. Having spoken to nearly all the head teachers in my constituency, I know that they are worried about it.

There are two sorts of school. Some are passionate about delivering good education to children with special educational needs, while others are immobilised by their lack of understanding of such children. That is not because they want to be poor at delivering good academic provision, but because they are inadequately supported in that task. The role of head teachers is also important. Some have a personal crusade with regard to children with special educational needs, while others do not.

Two outstanding primary schools in my constituency, Waterloo and Freshfield, have embraced such children—they have taken them from other schools when those schools can no longer support them. Those at the schools work hard and believe that they achieve a great deal, yet the league tables do not reflect that achievement in any way, shape or form. There is no information to tell me, as a parent, how well they have done with that group of children.

For most parents with normal children, a league table offers some choice. Despite its crudity, they can use it to assess which schools are better than the rest. I cannot. There is no choice for parents with children with special educational needs. When we look at league tables, it is impossible for us to tell which schools are striving and performing well for those children. That is unsatisfactory. I want the same choice that is afforded to other parents.

What is happening in secondary schools is even worse, if that is possible. I have before me the league tables for Sefton metropolitan borough, to which I referred when I was considering a senior place for my daughter. Most schools display a range of statistics relating to GCSEs and GNVQs. However, there is nothing about the six special needs schools. In every case, statistics are replaced by the words "not entered". There is my choice—it is "not entered". I do not believe that the thousand or so children who participate in those schools are incapable of gaining some form of qualification. I know that they are capable of it. I also know that there are teachers in those schools who are desperately trying to get the best out of the children. Where is their performance reflected? The answer is that it is not. Although a disproportionately large number of the children will not gain GNVQs or GCSEs, they will gain certificates of achievement. I want that to be reflected and so do other parents who find themselves in a similar position. They want to be able to make an informed choice.

I applaud my hon. Friend's comments about added value. It is a meaningful step forward for schools that are trying to deliver in all sorts of ways other than generally accepted qualifications. There must be some way that people outside the process can recognise that. Statistics are important not only for parents, but for target setting within schools—setting goals for which schools can strive. In Sefton, six special educational needs schools have no public standards against which they can strive to improve. I resent that. They should have those targets so that they can rise to the challenge of improving—in comparison not only with their own record, but with that of other providers in the same area.

I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could clarify the Government's intentions for added value, referring in particular to how special educational needs schools that do not enter any statistics in the league tables can be encouraged to do so. That will enable people like me—please forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for taking such a personal view—to be better informed as parents and providers.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): The hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) has no need to apologise for taking a personal view. It is a strength of debates such as this that personal experience can be brought to bear and I am sure that hon. Members have been moved by her contribution. I remember a debate in Worcestershire about the inclusion of special schools in league tables. There was some unhappiness about the fact that they were shown to be right at the bottom of the pile when the league tables were published. I sympathise with what the hon. Lady said and I hope that the Minister has taken her comments on board.

In the eight minutes that are available to me before we move on to the Government's response, I wish to draw the Chamber's attention back to the big picture. I had hoped to spend some time discussing middle schools in Worcestershire. The Minister recently experienced a rather painful reorganisation of the school system in Redditch—we share a local education authority. Particular problems surround the publication of results as they relate to middle schools. Those schools complain that they are judged on the results of first schools and high schools complain that they are judged on the results of middle schools.

In view of the limited time, however, I prefer to concentrate on the big picture. When the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) opened the debate, he rightly drew hon. Members' attention to problems with the publication of league tables. He spoke convincingly and well and I had great sympathy with what he said. However, he gave the game away a little by saying that he is fascinated by league tables and spends a long time poring over them—as do many other people.

The big issue is that publication of league tables has driven up standards and improved parental choice. I understand that to be the view of the Government. When I began to think about what I wanted to say today, I had a text in my mind, like a preacher: "Never make the best the enemy of the good." When one has a good idea—particularly if one takes it to able and talented civil servants, who are able to see problems in every good idea—there is a dreadful tendency to get so bogged down in worries that one fails to see that moving ahead, even imperfectly, can bring real benefits. We politicians have to be careful about being seen to justify reasons for keeping people in the dark. We have no privileged access to such information.

There is paranoia—or schizophrenia—in the Government's attitude to the subject. I thought that they were radical converts to publication of all sorts of results. I agree with a press release on 8 December which stated:

"The tables show that 11 year olds achieved higher standards in English, Maths and Science in this year's National Curriculum Tests than last year. Some of the most successful schools from across the country have been invited to an event held today at the Queen Elizabeth Conference Centre to celebrate their achievements."

It is right to celebrate the achievements of successful schools, and I am delighted that the Government are doing so. I hope that, in the same position, we would do the same. However, publication of key stage 1 results must be examined. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) will refer to that, so I shall not detain hon. Members with that now.

Another issue, which the hon. Member for Bury, North did not emphasise sufficiently, is that the measures are not just of school successes but the successes of local education authorities. I carefully examine the results for Worcestershire schools, particularly because I have a grievance about the funding received by my local education authority, as does the hon. Gentleman. I still hope that the Minister will be able to do something about that during her tenure at the Department for Education and Employment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Jacqui Smith): Ten years?

Mr. Luff: I said tenure. If there were a Labour Government for 10 years, I could think of no better Minister than her to fulful the role for that period, but I hope that that will not be so.

There is no doubt that Worcestershire's low educational funding leads to concern among my constituents that their children are receiving an education that is less good than it should be, and that concern is well founded. It is a great tribute to the education authority and the schools in Worcestershire that we have such good results in the league tables. They show that the desperately low funding does not, mercifully, cause bad results, which is a great tribute to all involved. I believe that the education authority is currently subject to an Ofsted inspection which, I am sure, will prove what a good authority it is.

What has struck me about the debate is how little it has moved on. I looked up the Second Reading of the Education (Schools) Bill, which took place on 19 November 1991. The right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who is now the Home Secretary, but was then the shadow spokesman on education, said:

"We now need to see some Government investment and leadership on how local authorities and school governing bodies can best provide information on and do research into the effectiveness of schools, into their creation of value added, so that that information can be given to parents and governors alongside the crude, raw data."

He was right, but the lack of progress in achieving that added value data, which is so important, is disappointing—I also criticised the previous Government for that. Intriguingly, when my then hon. Friend, Mr. Tim Eggar, wound up, he said something that is resonant today:

"Apparently the only sort of publication that Labour Members will allow is one that is so hedged around with correction factors, socio-economic variables and explanatory footnotes that only a parent with a PhD in statistics and specialisation in sociology could understand it."—[Official Report, 19 Novenber 1991; Vol. 199, c. 174-234.]

[Mr. Luff]

That is where the logic of the hon. Member for Bury, North was taking us.

I am Chairman of the Agriculture Committee and we often discuss labelling, which is apparently the answer to all our problems. We label for animal welfare, fat content, genetic modification and so on. The label will eventually become so large that the shopper will be unable to make any sense of it. That is the danger with school league tables. We must not allow the label to become so large that it is impossible for parents to understand what it describes. The comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) were important and I hope that the Minister will assure us that, whatever changes are planned for league tables, they will not fall into the tempting trap of making the best the enemy of the good. If league tables are to be effective, it is crucial that they are comprehensible.

I turn to added value, which is an ugly phrase, but I cannot think of a better one and it has entered the education lexicon, so we must live with it. It is a vital concept and I was pleased that the Government seemed to be committed to it. That is what their early statements during debates and questions in the House suggested, but there are now worrying signs that they may be resiling from that. A DFEE report in March 1999 stated:

"In the medium term, the performance tables will include measures of the value added by schools to the education of their pupils."

What is the medium term? As Keynes said,

"In the long run we are all dead", but what about the medium term? A report in The Times Educational Supplement on 26 November 1999 stated:

"no 'value-added' measure is now expected to be published until at least 2003, prompting accusations that the government plans to scrap the idea."

"Harvey Goldstein, professor of statistical methods at the Institute of Education in London, said: 'They are effectively saying that they are not going to do it. They are talking about 2005 or 2006 for a KS2 to GCSE measure, by which time we will be two governments further on.'"

I urge the Minister to reaffirm the commitment of her Government to value added measures and to ensure that she will not make the best the enemy of the good.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) for introducing the debate and agree with almost all he said, so I shall be brief.

We have no problem with publication of information on schools, but we question the value of the information that is published and the use to which it is put. League tables are good for Government because they allow them to demonstrate that they are meeting their targets and help them to impose and enforce national norms, which is increasingly the case in the education system. However, they are of little use to parents and pupils.

Most parents send their children to local schools and there are good social reasons for that. The children can play outside and can be allowed to walk to school. Some Government initiatives will be satisfied only if parents continue to choose local schools. League tables fire up a notion of parental choice which cannot be satisfied in urban or rural areas. The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) referred to the problem in rural areas, but it is equally a problem in urban areas where it is often too risky to choose a school other than in the catchment area. In Sheffield, people come to me every year saying that they tried to exercise parental choice by examining league tables to decide which school was best, but when they failed to obtain their first choice, their catchment school had become full and they were told to ship their children across the city to a school with surplus places, which was, by definition, unpopular and probably poorly performing and which required their children to take two or three buses to go to a school the parents did not want them to go to. That is the reality in urban areas and the notion that parents can sit down, examine league tables and choose schools for their children does not exist in most areas and certainly not in Sheffield. Government pressure is to take surplus places out of the system and parental choice is not possible without surplus places.

We question the value of the Government's original intention to engender parental choice to develop a market. That has not happened and will not happen, unless someone is prepared to fund the sort of system that the Conservatives have proposed with totally free access to schools. The cost would be phenomenal if schools could balloon to a greater size one year and reduce in size the next year as parents made their choices.

Parents are sending their children to local schools. They may examine the league tables and become concerned about their local schools, but they have no option of removing their children. The tables may be interesting, but they do not provide any practical benefit.

When a school is perceived to be poor and remains at the bottom of the league table, great harm can result to its morale, year after year, because no one rises to low expectation. A culture of low expectation is generated within the school and that does an incredible amount of harm.

The hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) spoke eloquently on the issue of special needs. Nether Green junior school in my constituency has an emotional and behavioural difficulty unit. It does a tremendous job with its pupils, and is as good as any other school in the area, but it is consistently down the league tables. Year after year, parents say, "I want to send my child there, but I am a bit concerned because it is down in the league tables." The school does a tremendous job with special needs and non-special needs pupils, but it is aggrieved by those comments. I have every sympathy, but I have failed to get anywhere in changing the system, so that the school can take its rightful place and not have to face the stream of parents every year. The hon. Member for Crosby expressed that effectively.

The hon. Member for Bury, North made a good point about the broadening of the curriculum for 14 to 19-year-olds. It can be a tremendous achievement for some pupils to get a grade D at GCSE, but that is not recognised. We fully support the broadening of the curriculum, which would make both the GCSE and the

A-level league table factors irrelevant when deciding whether a school is doing well. There is tremendous work with advanced GNVQs going on at present. We are expecting more, and we need to acknowledge that when considering a school's performance.

One group that may have felt the benefits of league tables is estate agents, who frequently cite them in their publicity. I would argue that they are of limited benefit, even to estate agents, because most parents knew before league tables were introduced what was going on in their area. People from outside may find them beneficial in deciding where to live, but most of them will have chosen where to live by their profession, income and so on. We know that the socio-economic group of an area is a factor in creating a better or worse school. The estate agents' argument is a minor part of the equation, and I would question whether the league tables have added much value.

Our real criticism is, what have the league tables done for the worst off in the education system—for that small, but still too large, percentage who are always on the wrong side of the target and are perceived as failures? Ninety per cent. success means 10 per cent. failure; 75 per cent. success means 25 per cent. failure. We are concerned about the social exclusion unit report, which shows that 9 per cent. of our 16 to 18-year-olds—161,000 young people—are not socially and economically engaged. One of the prime factors identified was educational failure and educational disadvantage. The Government's obsession with targets is laudable in as much as they want to get so many pupils up to a notional average, but if we do not pay attention to the small number who continue to fail by all measures, there can be no true success. I hope that the Minister will say what she believes league tables do for the young people who are most in need, other than simply confirming year on year that they are continuing to fail.

What do league tables do for schools that deal with the most difficult children in the education system? The Government must continue to focus on improving opportunities for the lowest performers, as well as on trying to raise standards generally. They should consider methods such as individual education plans, mentoring and other imaginative ideas that have been suggested to deal with pupils as individuals. We should move away from looking at the averages across the mass of pupils and consider the individual. We hope that the Government will do that, thereby proving that they are interested not only in the many, who make up the mass of the figures in the league tables, but the few who are often on the wrong side of the statistics that people use to judge schools.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on securing the debate. I know that he takes a particular interest in the subject, and he gave a thoughtful speech this morning. I am not sure that I want to go all the way down the road that he took us, but I recognise his interest in the matter. I note that the Liberal Democrats are interested in traversing that road, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) showed.

For our part, it is now generally accepted that parents have a right to know the information that is contained in the tables; it should be published. It acts as a spur to better performance. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) was right when he said that publication has been one of the factors that has driven up standards. It is worth recalling that that was not always the case. The previous Government began to collect and publish information, in the face of bitter opposition from certain quarters. It certainly was not greeted with acclaim on all sides. That Government had the wisdom and foresight to persevere in the face of all that was thrown at it. By the end of their period of office, there was more general acceptance of the publication of tables. The Government were engaged in preparatory work on including a measure of value added in the performance data, to give an even fuller picture. I refer to performance data based on prior attainments. I shall say more about the different forms of value added later. We are interested in prior attainment and have reservations, to say the least, about other notions of value added.

It would be useful to hear from the Minister the latest state of play in the Government's plans for measuring value added on the basis of prior attainment. I do not want to repeat the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire, but it did not escape my attention either that there seems to have been a bit of back-sliding on the part of the Government. Having started out stating that they intended to work on value added, they are slipping back. We were told in the departmental report of last year that, in the medium term, the performance tables will include measures of value added by schools for the education of their pupils. It is entirely right to ask what the medium term is in that context.

The Minister should also answer the questions posed by the hon. Member for Bury, North. We are interested in the same question, but from a different direction. The hon. Gentleman made it clear that he wants to go on, after prior attainment has been taken into account as value added, to look at other measures as well, based on factors other than prior attainment. What is the Government's attitude to that? When they talk about value added, do they mean simply prior attainment, or will they consider other factors, such as social factors and educational performance, as suggested by the hon. Member for Bury, North? We think that that is a dangerous route to take. My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) is right to say that it muddies the waters and makes things less clear. The hon. Member for Bury, North gave a thoughtful speech, but I was not entirely clear whether he wanted the measures of value added, as he would have them, to be in addition to the league tables that we have, which are based on prior attainment, or whether he wanted them to be replaced.

Mr. Chaytor: I should confirm that they would be in addition. My criticism of the current system is its selective use of freedom of information. I want a more comprehensive presentation of information.

Mr. Clappison: If that is so, we need to know the Government's attitude. Do they want to go down that route? Do they want value added to be measured according to social factors? We think that that would muddy the waters and complicate the picture for parents. There would be difficulties in selecting the factors that need to be taken into account in measuring value added. Many factors and considerations would complicate the picture greatly when what parents really want is a measure of the performance of schools and the value added that is given to the pupils through good teaching. The Government need to clarify matters.

There is still work to be done on information about performance. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire said, we want publication of the results for reading and maths at key stage 1 in national performance tables on a school by school basis, to enable parents to see how well those schools are performing. Exactly the same arguments apply in respect of the publication of performance data at key stage 1 as now apply at key stage 2. Parents have the right to know and it will help to drive up standards if such information is given to them. What is the Government's attitude to that? It is an entirely natural development of the existing system that will help to drive up standards. What is the Government's timetable and approach at key stage 2 on value added based on prior attainment? We are aware that the Government said a lot about that early on in their Administration, but we have not seen much action. The Minister needs to say clearly what the Government intend and where they are heading.

The hon. Member for Bury, North is not alone in his fascination for league tables; we are all interested in them. They are widely available and appear in many newspapers. Indeed, I join my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale in hoping that they will become available on the internet. The media do not publish such information out of curiosity; they know that parents are very interested in it. It is good that parents receive it, but we would like them to be given even more information. We believe that they have a right to know, because it is good for the education of their children and it helps to drive up standards. We now need some clear answers from the Government on where we go from here.

11.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Jacqui Smith): Given that some hon. Members have been up all night for the sitting of the House, the quality of the debate has been particularly high. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on securing further discussion of school performance. I am aware of his interest in the progress of schools—in Bury and nationally—and of his concerns, which are shared by the Government. However, I do not necessarily agree with his solution that we need to publish fair, accurate and genuinely comparable information on achievements in schools.

I commend the schools in my hon. Friend's constituency. I congratulate the teachers, pupils, governors and the local education authority on their good work, which is represented in the performance tables and, as my hon. Friend said, in other sources of information.

I am grateful to have the opportunity to say a few words about the value of performance tables—and their limitations—and about the Government's progress on ensuring that they are accurate and truthful, and that they give a fair representation of what is happening in our schools. The clear consensus is that the debate is no longer about whether tables should be published, but about what information should be published and how.

The Government are aware of the challenges that have been mentioned this morning. We are also aware of the difficulties of publishing the information. We must ensure that tables promote accountability, but we must do so in a way that supports the Government's educational objectives of raising standards and promoting inclusion. We should celebrate improvements in schools and properly reflect what schools have achieved, given the challenges that they face. However, performance tables should not create perverse incentives because of the manner in which the information is publicised.

The Government agreed that tables should be more than a simple annual report of a school's raw results. We should focus firmly on measures of improvement. I emphasise that I am speaking about performance tables, not league tables. I believe strongly that the tables produce information about the relative performance of schools, although I fear what local and national newspapers might choose to make of the information. The Government can take some responsibility for what is published. However, if we have the power to control the message that goes out about schools, please believe me—we would use it. Some of the messages that hon. Members have mentioned this morning show that the information that we want to emphasise about our local schools is not necessarily what gets into the newspapers.

We have taken steps to ensure that the performance tables reflect matters that we believe are important, and that they do not result in perverse incentives. Our first step in 1997 was to provide information showing the changes in GCSE results, to enable readers of those tables to see whether schools improved their results over the next four years. I note that three secondary schools in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North maintained or improved their performance between 1996 and 1999. They deserve to be congratulated on that.

We now include information showing trends in GCSE, A-level and AS-level exam results and trends in key stage 2 results. That gives people the opportunity to focus on whether schools are improving their performance. When publishing the performance tables, we single out the top 100 primary and secondary schools that have managed to sustain an improvement over the previous four years. Those schools certainly deserve to be praised for their achievements. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) mentioned the event that took place in December to celebrate success. It is important to note that that event was about celebrating the success not only of those schools at the top of the league tables that are published by others, but of those schools that have shown improvement over a period.

We place great emphasis not only on those pupils who achieve five A-star to C passes, but on those who leave school with no GCSE or general national vocational qualification passes—a matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker). I hope to reassure the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) that we want the performance tables and other published information so as to ensure that schools focus on raising standards for all young people, and that all young people are included in the improved standards.

We have also provided new information on GCSE and GNVQ results by introducing an average points score per pupil. That is quite important, as it addresses the concerns of those hon. Members who thought that the target of five A-star to C grades did not recognise the achievement of teachers who help young people to achieve a D instead of an E grade, which I fully accept can be a great achievement. The average points score ensures that the results of all the young people entered for GCSE exams are represented.

We have improved the information provided on pupils with special educational needs by showing how many pupils with statements of special educational needs there are in the cohort of pupils to whom the results relate. The information provided in the tables will help readers to put a school's results into the context of the school's work with children with special educational needs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) made a powerful contribution. She eloquently highlighted what I accept is a difficulty, which is how fully to reflect the achievements of special schools and ordinary schools that make an effort to include children with special educational needs. In fact, we receive as many calls for pupils with special educational needs to be excluded from the performance tables as we do for more information to be published in the performance tables about students with special educational needs. That is not an excuse, but I hope that my hon. Friend recognises the difficulty. The fact that we have not solved the problem does not mean that we believe that those achievements are not important. We must continue looking for ways to ensure that those achievements are reflected.

Certificates of achievement are important. When including new qualifications in the performance tables, we must be clear about their equivalents if we are to make a true comparison. That answers the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), who spoke of the importance of ensuring a rigorous analysis of the equivalents of existing qualifications. I can assure him that the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority has undertaken rigorous work to ensure that that equivalence on GNVQs is included in performance tables. I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the way in which young people who take GCSEs a year early are included in the league tables. The results at year 11 are cumulative in terms of results achieved, regardless of whether they were achieved that year or in the previous year. However, if he writes to me on the particular cases that he is concerned about, I shall follow that up.

To turn to some of the substantive points made by the hon. Member for Bury, North, we have also stepped up the pace of developing value-added measures for publication. We face certain constraints in regard to performance tables: we must ensure that we do not overburden schools with checking the information or overload parents with too much information, so that even those who are not performance-table junkies—as most hon. Members present seem to be—will be able to get the information that they need from it.

It is also important to point out that tables are not the only source of information available. I would strongly emphasis the need for parents to look at the whole range of information available on a school—the prospectus, for example, which already gives parents the opportunity to analyse, to take up the point of the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), information about key stage 1 results. We encourage parents to look at the whole range of information. Our parents' website, launched last year, also gives parents the opportunity for parents to access it on a geographical basis, or on the basis of their children's ages; it provides information about the school's performance, linked to the Office of Standards in Education and the schools' website. So I hope that we are keeping up with the technological revolution.

The issue of value added is very important. We need to clarify the uses to which we put it. The Government have done important work in their publication of the autumn package, which gives schools the type of benchmarking information that is important in enabling schools to consider how they can use value added to improve the school. The hon. Member for Bury North, mentioned, among other acronyms, the YELLIS and the ALIS schemes, which I used myself when I was teaching and found useful in ensuring that targets are set for individuals in the school. However, there is a difference between the use of the information for school improvement and its use in terms of the publication. There are many calls to introduce socio-economic measures or other factors to adjust the real results published in the performance tables. Although I can understand the motivation for those calls—it may be important for schools to use such adjustment factors within their schools improvement process—we will continue to resist them. We do not want to create a situation whereby schools feel able to use such factors as an excuse for poor performance. There is a big distinction between the best and the least best performing schools in the same socio-economic band and we need to address that.

Considerable progress has been made on value added measures. We need to emphasise that one of the challenges that the Government have faced in bringing them forward has been the need to base them not only on prior attainment, as the hon. Gentleman stressed, but on a pupil's individual progress. He said that the previous Government had made preparations for that, but we found that the mechanisms were not in place to measure pupils' individual progress, which we believe should be the basis of publication. We have now put them into place. We expect the individual pupil information that was first succesfully captured in 1998 to come to fruition in the near future; without having taken that rigorous approach to individual pupil attainment, we would have run the risk of attracting the criticism of those, for example, who have highlighted mobility as an issue that affects schools. We expect to publish in the league tables for 2004 value added for key stages 2 to 4 based on individual pupil attainment. That will be very important. We are already working on pilots for the publication of value added in sixth forms and FE colleges.

Rover

11.26 am

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): First, I should like to say how grateful I am to the House authorities and to Mr. Deputy Speaker for having selected the debate on the future of Rover, which will have an hour and a half of hon. Members' time. It is a matter of significant public interest, especially to the midlands area. As hon. Members will know, the announcement that the European Commission was to launch an inquiry into the Government grant of June 1999 was not made until 22 December, the day on which the House rose for the Christmas recess. Today is therefore the first time that hon. Members have debated this vital subject, which reflects on the economic vitality of the midlands region. We are grateful to have the Minister present. We would like several questions answered about the role of the Government in the awarding of the grant and in subsequent events.

My interest in the Longbridge plant, one of the Rover plants, derives from the fact that it is in my constituency—as well as in that of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden). The majority of the plant is in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, although, with the prospect of a future planning application, that may not be the case in future. However, that is a matter for another day; today we are discussing the situation at Longbridge.

Longbridge employs around 9,000 people, which is considerably down on the employment figure of around 14,000 of more than 18 months ago, when the Government came to power. The plant has been reduced from what it once was, the biggest employer of the Rover group; Solihull employs about 10,000 people and Cowley about 4,000. Its economic importance to the midlands region is hard to overestimate. The accepted multiplier criterion is that for every one directly employed job there are between three and four others in service and support industry suppliers and so on. The commonly accepted figure is that any threat to Longbridge would have a wider employment impact on the west midlands region of about 40,000 jobs. The prosperity of my constituents and those of many hon. Members is dependent on the reinvestment in the Longbridge works going ahead. That is what we are all here for—to be reassured of that and to establish how the present situation arose, which is one of our principal concerns.

We must face the fact that Longbridge is an old plant; I believe that it will shortly celebrate its 100th anniversary. It has been around for along time, providing prosperity and jobs, and is an old plant for modern production purposes. We must bear it in mind that the need for reinvestment at the Longbridge site is predicated on the fact that productivity needs to rise. Great strides have already been made, and it is a credit to the work force and the management that signifcant improvements have been made, with productivity rising from about 30 workers a car to about 50 for the new Rover 25 and Rover 45. However, productivity must rise if Rover is to have a secure and long-term future in the United Kingdom. That is one of the reasons why BMW wants to make a major investment in the Lonbridge factory.

Another important factor has been the good faith of BMW since it took over Rover Group Ltd. some years ago. As hon. Members know, Rover has had a variety of owners, and it is a source of contention in the midlands which were the better ones. We should credit BMW for investing in the Rover group when it took over the company. At the time, it was widely speculated that BMW was interested only in Land Rover and having a four-wheel-drive product in their vehicle range, and that it might not show the same commitment to the Rover car itself. It is hard to pin that accusation on BMW. It has put massive investment into the Solihull and Cowley plants.

My difficulty, as the hon. Member for Bromsgrove, is that Longbridge has come last and has been rather a Cinderella, and we are now waiting for the investment that Longbridge so sorely needs. In fairness, BMW is committing itself to a £1.7 billion reinvestment programme at the plant, which is the largest single inward investment programme for the UK so far. We are obviously grateful that it is showing its commitment to an old plant. It was extremely welcome news when the BMW board made it clear that it wanted to proceed with that.

As hon. Members know, part of that bid was the offer from the British Government of £151 million-worth of aid, to which I shall return later. I emphasise the commitment that BMW has made. The new retro Mini, akin to the new Volkswagen Beetle, is about to be built at Longbridge. We are waiting to discover how it will look. It should be unveiled in October, and people should be able to buy it next year. Its production has already been committed to Longbridge, which is very welcome, and we are delighted.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): As someone who used to work in the car industry in a former life, I greatly value that opportunity to debate this important matter. Does the hon. Lady agree that hon. Members have a duty and a responsiblity in arguing for a strong Rover at Longbridge to do so outside the House as well as inside, by their own actions?

Miss Kirkbride: The hon. Gentleman seems to be recommending motherhood and apple pie. Of course we all want to support the Longbridge factory and the Rover works, both inside and outside the House, although I may have missed his point.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I am not sure whether I am missing the point, but, bearing in mind what the hon. Lady just said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster), does she drive a Rover, and, if not, what car does she drive?

Miss Kirkbride: I drive a BMW, owned by the Rover group. I am sure that it would be of great interest for us all to declare our car interests.

Mr. Snape: I shall do so myself in a minute or two.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order.

Miss Kirkbride: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was about to discuss the important and welcome investment in the Rover group that BMW has made.

The Rover 75 has been a success. Following the intervention of the hon. Member for Worcester, I should like to put it on record that, although there has been much speculation that the Rover 75 has not been as successful as it might have been, in fact it was the third top-selling saloon in its class in the second half of last year, outselling the Alfa Romeo 156, the Audi A6, the Jaguar S-type, the Mercedes C-class and other models. It was also voted import car of the year in Japan, beating, among other marques, Mercedes. The Rover 75 has been a success and is welcome. Land Rover speaks for itself, and is a hugely successful model. The Rover 25 and the Rover 45, which replace the Rover 200 and the Rover 400, have also been well received and, although they have been upgraded to make them more attractive, we are keen for a Rover 30 to be built at Longbridge, which, if we could stick to the original timetable as we still hope to do, would be introduced in 2003.

What, then, is the problem? Why is Rover not simply an untold success story? The problem has partly been the rising value of the pound. The pound has risen in value since BMW announced its £1.7 billion investment programme for Longbridge plant in 1997–98, when the exchange rate to the deutschmark stood at DM2.75. I rang the Library today, and discovered that the pound is valued against the notional area covered by the deutschmark in the euro zone at DM3.22. That is a massive rise in the value of sterling against the deutschmark. In short, it raises the price of the reinvestment at Longbridge for BMW, the German owners of the Rover group, by 15 per cent., which is worrying. The high pound has also encouraged—

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Can we assume from the hon. Lady's remarks on the strength of the pound that she agrees with Professor Sämann, the chairman of the Rover group, who said:

"Membership of the European Union has been a major factor in encouraging BMW Group's investments in the UK and therefore safeguards Rover's future. . . . The next step, full UK membership of the EURO, would consolidate this investment."?

May we take it that she agrees with those sentiments?

Miss Kirkbride: Sadly, I do not have that quote in front of me. However, Professor Sämann goes on to say that although BMW, as I fully recognise, would like the UK to join the euro, it does not want us to do so at the present exchange rate. If the hon. Gentleman finished the quote, he would find that the UK's joining the euro at the present exchange rate is not on BMW's agenda. Moreover, if he were serving his constituents, he would also recognise that manufacturing industry has been put on his back—

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Is my hon. Friend aware that it was recently reported that Toyota had written to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, asking him to make representations to the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee about the strong pound? When I tabled a question to the Secretary of State, asking him whether he had done so, I received the rather ambiguous reply—which I assume meant yes; perhaps we shall hear an explanation later—that it is common for Secretaries of State to make representations to that committee about the strength of the pound. Perhaps I should table another question, on behalf of Rover.

Miss Kirkbride: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Government cannot recognise the difference between a strong pound, which is, on the whole, welcome—the German economy was very successful with a strong currency for many years, until unification created more recent problems—and an overvalued pound. Those of us who represent the midlands would do well to recognise the huge damage caused to the manufacturing sector, much of which is based in our area, by the strength of the pound.

Mr. Snape: Perhaps the hon. Lady could explain the impact of the strong pound on manufacturing industry in the west midlands by providing statistics, rather than relying on the editorial columns of the newspaper for which she writes a weekly column, The Birmingham Post, which has been undermining the regional economy for many years.

Miss Kirkbride: I think that I would be called to order if I sought to defend The Birmingham Post, which is an excellent newspaper that merely seeks to tell the truth about the activities of our Labour Government. I would be happy to point out one of the problems—

Mr. Snape: No, statistics.

Miss Kirkbride: I would like to cite my own statistics rather than those that the hon. Gentleman wants to foist on me. As he knows, BMW recently announced that, because of the high pound and the problems of the exchange rate, it would reduce the outsourcing of its supplies for Rover in the United Kingdom from 89 per cent. to 50 per cent. during the next five years. That is in part due to the strength of the overvalued pound, which causes huge problems for BMW because spare parts are traded in the international economy and it will therefore go for the cheapest sources. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he does not understand economics.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I have some sympathy with the hon. Lady's concerns about the high value of the pound, and I would like the Government to try to reduce it to a more sustainable level so that we can ultimately join the euro.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) asked for statistics. Yesterday, The Birmingham Post printed an article headed "Car production races to 27-year high", which showed that there had been an 11.5 per cent. increase in car exports between 1998 and 1999. Also, the report by the West Midlands group of chambers of commerce suggests that manufacturing prospects are optimistic and that, through investment and action to increase productivity, our manufacturing industry is coping with the high pound. I would like the hon. Lady to acknowledge that that is a tribute to the Government's encouragement of such investment.

There is a problem with the pound, and I would like something to be done—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind hon. Members that the debates are short and interventions ought to reflect that brevity.

Miss Kirkbride: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) makes a point that we can all recognise: that a strong pound has a beneficial effect on productivity. That is bearing fruit, but an overvalued pound creates problems. Our balance of trade figures have deteriorated significantly under the Government. It seem reasonable to conclude that the overvalued pound is one of the reasons for that and for the job losses in the manufacturing sector during the past few years. I am sure that the West Midlands CBI and other trade organisations would confirm that.

The Minister must respond to the problem of the overvalued pound, about which I am sure that the Department of Trade and Industry receives many representations. We also want to question her more closely on the award of the grant to BMW for the Rover group, which was announced in June by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

As the Member of Parliament for the area that includes Longbridge, I warmly welcomed the Government's announcement that they were to award £151 million of Government aid to BMW for its investments at the plant. However, in awarding that grant, Ministers should have met the European Union's criteria, because they had to satisfy the European Commission that they had acted properly within those rules. Ministers had to be sure that, without the benefit of state aid to ensure that the jobs remained in the United Kingdom, BMW would have seriously considered relocating the Longbridge plant outside the European Union. Her Majesty's Government had to establish that that was firmly the case before they awarded the grant.

When the welcome award was announced, we all reasonably assumed that the representations, discussions and considerations had been made and that there should be no problem. The fact that the award was immediately followed by speculation that the Commission would launch an inquiry, as I am sad to say that it did in December, raises severe questions about the competence of Ministers' handling of the bid and whether they sought proper reassurances and followed proper guidelines. They would have been fully aware of the European Union's rules.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): If the hon. Lady is suggesting that there was no contact between the Department and the Commission when the talks were held with BMW, I can assure her that that is not the case. It is routine for the Commission to take a second look at all such grants after the event.

Miss Kirkbride: I would not necessarily dispute what the hon. Gentleman said, but it is not routine for the Commission to launch an inquiry. Of course it considers whether the rules have been complied with, but it does not necessarily launch an inquiry. The hon. Gentleman has missed the point. The inquiry raises a question as to whether Ministers properly complied with the rules when awarding the grant.

Mrs. Browning: In response to the press conference of 23 June at which the announcement was made, the Competition Commission said two days later:

"So far the Directorate-General of Competition (DG IV) has had only one meeting with the UK authorities on May 11th last. Since then, apart from some technical queries, there have been no further contacts."

Does my hon. Friend agree that it is extraordinary that such an announcement should have been made at a UK press conference when there had been only one rather tenuous meeting at which the Competition Commissioner was not even informed of the announcement?

Miss Kirkbride: My hon. Friend puts a strong case based on that further evidence. It seems that Ministers jumped the gun when making an announcement that was extremely sensitive and important to the economy of the midlands. It was up to Ministers to establish that they had followed the rules, to reassure the Commission that they had done so and to persuade it that the award should not be subject to an inquiry. Clearly, that has not happened.

The inquiry adds to the uncertainty at the Longbridge plant. Having had the announcement from Her Majesty's Government in June that the money would be forthcoming, BMW at Rover was set to invest at the end of last year. The bricks and mortar of the factory's rebuilding should have been put in place in November and December, but that has not gone ahead because BMW is waiting to see what happens. That vital investment in the midlands is not being made because Ministers might have acted incompetently in not ensuring that the rules were properly complied with before they made the announcement.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Lady normally has outspoken anti-European views. She would surely have used her newspaper column to denounce Ministers as incompetent in the same way if, last year, they had said, "We would like to give the grant to Rover, but we shan't until we have had the fullest possible consultation with the European Community."

Miss Kirkbride: I think that the hon. Gentleman makes my point; clearly, Ministers jumped the gun and did not get the proper reassurances. It was up to the Government, not the BMW board, to make the case and establish that the rules had been followed. They should have examined Hungary and crossed all the bases, so that the Commission would have had no locus to launch the investigation. That was not done. An investigation started on 22 December and we now face uncertainty and the prospect of no investment in the plant until summer at the earliest and only then if the inquiry does not find against the Government on the award of the grant. That will lead to further uncertainty about what BMW will do.

That brings us up to date. Having announced the launch of the inquiry, we are now waiting to find out what happens. BMW told me this week that it was optimistic about gaining a preliminary verdict from the European Commission as early as this week. Where do we go from here? The Commission will establish its criteria and assess whether the rules have been complied with. The Government and BMW—as well as other European car manufacturers which also want their say—will then have a chance to make their observations on the findings. That process will take around four weeks, after which the Commission will take another four to six weeks to determine its findings. We are now talking about in excess of two, or perhaps even three, months before we receive a final answer about awarding the grant, which adds yet again to the uncertainty of the process.

I shall be grateful if the Minister would clarify whether the Commission has received all the relevant documentation from the Government to enable it to proceed with the preliminary inquiry. Is she satisfied that the Government acted hastily enough to forward the documents to the Commission to allow it to formulate its conclusions? Time is of the essence. When does the Minister believe that the Commission will reach a verdict, so that we can finally ascertain whether the rules for awarding the money were met?

I affirm the importance of that point. Hon. Members will know that BMW has its annual general meeting in April—approximately the same time that it will announce this year's financial results. We know from press speculation that losses at the Longbridge plant have increased considerably over those for last year. If losses approach the £1 billion figure, as suggested in the press—including The Birmingham Post, which is clearly well sourced—it will inevitably cause concern among board members. If the award of the grant is still indeterminate or even if a conclusion has been reached, it will be a moment of great decision for the future of the Longbridge plant. It would help the BMW board if it knew the status of the grant in time for the April meeting, which would clarify once and for all the investment project for the Longbridge group.

I pay tribute to all the workers at Longbridge, who have shown much flexibility and determination to ensure success by operating changes at the plant. I also pay tribute to BMW, which showed good faith in its willingness to invest in the Longbridge plant, which has existed for 100 years. People in the midlands are tremendously proud of the unique Britishness of the Rover car. We very much want operations to continue at Longbridge, but Ministers must now play their part to overcome the sad and unsettling affairs of the past few months.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) on securing a debate on the future of Rover. It is an important issue, as the hon. Lady has shown in her remarks. However, not everyone in the west midlands would congratulate her entirely on her approach. The biggest problem for the Rover group, and the Longbridge plant in particular, in the past two years has not always been what has happened there. The situation has been hyped up and it has had to contend with damaging speculation about what might be going on round the corner.

Speculation affects confidence and sales. I would not dispute the hon. Lady's figures—that 50,000 jobs in the midlands depend on the success of the Longbridge plant. However, we must be careful to ensure that our actions in this place do not add to speculation and uncertainty, and I am not convinced that set-piece debates at this stage are helping to dampen them down.

The hon. Lady raised several questions about the Government's record and the story so far, which deserve an answer. She sought to attribute blame for delays in the granting of European Commission approval for the deal to the Department of Trade and Industry and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who, she alleges, did not prepare the ground before agreeing the deal with BMW. It is a serious charge to assert that Governments do not prepare the ground before taking action that might have European implications. It is particularly serious regarding the Rover group because this is not the first time that European investigations have taken place.

The hon. Lady will know that the Rover group was sold by the Conservative Government to British Aerospace in 1988. In fact, the then Government were prepared to write off the entire debts of the Rover group to the tune of £800 million and then to sell it for £150 million. That deal was questioned in the late 1980s by the European Commission, which found that the Government's actions breached EU rules and demanded a recovery of £300 million-worth of the sweeteners given by the Government to British Aerospace. That whole saga of sweeteners and the Aerospace deal did nothing for the confidence in the Rover group and nothing for the future.

That series of events also led to a National Audit Office report. As we are debating the important role of Governments in these matters, it is worth quoting from that report of 1989. It concluded, after examining the deal:

"the fact remains that the Department's negotiating resulted in British Aerospace paying £150 million for a business which made a profit before interest and tax of £65 million in 1988 . . . and which also had surplus assets and other benefits worth at least £250 million, of which it has so far realised £126 million".

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Despite the figures that the hon. Gentleman has just cited and the current difficulties of the Rover group, would he agree that the industrial performance of Rover in the decade after the sale was considerably better than in the period leading up to the sale, which shows that it was a positive move?

Mr. Burden: It is certainly true that Rover has progressed, but I would not conclude that the deal was an appropriate mechanism, especially without any tendering, renegotiation or offers to other firms. It was a case of writing off debts of £800 million and selling for £150 million—that is what the National Audit Office report was all about. Many of us believe that the Government could have secured a much better deal for the taxpayer, and it took the European Commission to remind them of it at the time.

I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Bromsgrove was not in the House then. It may even have been before she worked as a journalist for The Daily Telegraph. She was, however, in this place during the early part of last year, when negotiations over the current deal were going on. As I understand it, the hon. Lady's charge today is that the Government did not prepare the way or do enough, and needed to check up on what was happening. As she rightly said, she and I share that plant. It was therefore important that she and I, as local Members of Parliament, made sure that we knew what was going on.

I was interested to read in The Birmingham Post of 19 March 1999 a report about the negotiations that were taking place. At that stage, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had made an initial offer of £118 million to BMW in respect of the deal. The quote that the hon. Member for Bromsgrove gave from The Birmingham Post—I am quoting from the paper, so it must be right—was:

"I am disgusted. The Government knows that the prosperity of the Midlands depends on the future of Longbridge and to offer almost half the money requested by BMW is an insult to us. Stephen Byers should be on the telephone immediately putting this matter right."

No words of caution there about checking that things were in line with European rules. The hon. Lady's point was simply that BMW had asked for a large amount of money, so the Government should go ahead and pay it. An interesting approach to economic policy—whether it represents the Conservative party's new economic policy I do not know.

Miss Kirkbride: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to offer a riposte to his fatuous remarks. It is obvious that the Government upped their bid by a further 30 per cent. or more when they offered £151 million. I did not realise that the Opposition's role these days is to ensure that Ministers act competently at all times. I just assumed that the Government knew the rules and would abide by them. I realise now that that was a silly assumption and I am sorry.

Mr. Burden: The hon. Lady has her views on the responsibilities of a Member of Parliament to his constituents and I have my views of what those would have been at that time.

I will move on to what the deal was, what it is and where it goes from here. I have used harsh words about the hon. Lady but I agree with her about the contribution made by the people involved with the plant, especially its employees, and the partnership that they have shown with the company in reaching a ground-breaking deal on working practices, without which we would not be where we are today. All of us should pay tribute to that.

It is a pity—although no doubt it was an oversight rather than deliberate—that the hon. Lady did not pay tribute, as all of us should do, to the local partners who played such an important role in bringing that deal to a successful conclusion. I pay particular tribute to Birmingham city council for its efforts in bringing about an important local element of the deal, to the Birmingham TEC, the chamber of commerce and industry, and to Advantage West Midlands—the regional development agency—which between them were able to put together the package of £23 million that forms an integral part of the deal.

In addition, some £129 million of regional selective assistance was agreed. It is important to put on record what the grant was all about. It was not a grant given because BMW asked those bodies for some money and they said, "Let's pay it." It was not a bail-out. It is important to emphasise that and it is unfortunate that the hon. Lady did not recognise it. It is a deal with clear productivity targets and it is phased over a period. It is about raising skills and about investment by the company itself. As the hon. Lady said, a sum in excess of £1 billion is being levered in through regional selective assistance and the local package. If we add BMW's contribution to the United Kingdom as a whole, there is investment of approximately £3 billion.

The European Commission has chosen to take the issue to a full investigation. I consider that unnecessary. Its decision was made in December and did not follow immediately the submission of the application by the Government and BMW—the Commission had had it for some time, and various questions were asked, and answered. I do not think that an investigation was necessary. When I and Labour MEPs for the West Midlands Simon Murphy, Neena Gill and Michael Cashman met Commissioner Monti in December, we asked him whether the Government had failed to provide information that the Commission had requested. I have to tell the hon. Member for Bromsgrove that Commissioner Monti did not come up with anything on that: he said only that there were still things that the Commission wished to look at. He said that the Government had not failed to provide anything that the Commission had requested of them.

Commissioner Monti decided to go ahead with the inquiry anyway. I do not know whether the hon. Lady has ever attempted to meet the Commissioner, but he made it clear when we met him that he did not see this matter as anything peculiar or as making an exception for Rover. He drew our attention—the hon. Lady, who also presumably takes an interest in the motor industry, will be aware of this—to the fact that inquiries into Fiat and Volkswagen have been launched over deals that involved assistance, although in many respects they were not exactly similar to the Rover deal. Therefore, there is nothing especially surprising about the Rover investigation.

Where I take issue with the Commission—and believe that there is a significant difference between the Rover deal and the Volkswagen and Fiat deals—is that in both the latter cases the money was paid up front, so the Commission's investigation took place afterwards. I do not question the Commission's right to investigate, or the Rover deal itself. What I do question, given that we in Britain have played exactly by the book and—as the hon. Lady said ought to happen—have sought approval before the money is paid, is its decision to investigate after questions have been asked and answered. In my view, that is unnecessary. However, the Commission has decided to go ahead with the investigation. The vital message to the Commission today is that we need a decision soon because that inquiry is about an investment programme to bring a new car to market within 18 months to two years. It is most important that the Commission gets on and makes its decision quickly.

As for the future, the company faces real challenges. A huge number of suppliers in the west midlands and elsewhere depend on Rover group. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove referred to some of their current difficulties. It is true that the pound is causing difficulties. The hon. Lady would do well to listen to the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) about what BMW says about that. If, in that context, she honestly believes that sterling should become a sort of hedge currency against a weak euro, and that that would improve the position of exporters in any way, she has a rather curious view of economics.

However, there are things that we can do about suppliers and the component industry. It is important for BMW to understand that it has a responsibility to maintain a healthy supply base in the UK.

Miss Kirkbride: For clarification, although we understand that Labour Members are keen to join the euro, it would help Opposition Members if we could establish the rate at which it would be acceptable for the pound to join. Is it DM3.22, as today, or the DM2.75 of 1997–98? [HON. MEMBERS: "That is a stupid question."] It is a relevant question. I regret that Labour Members do not understand its relevance to manufacturing industry.

Mr. Burden: If the hon. Lady has attended debates in the House, she will know that the Chancellor has set out clearly the criteria that will be important for joining the euro.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. A great deal of heckling is going on this afternoon for some reason or another. I ask hon. Members to desist.

Mr. Burden: Where I take issue with the hon. Lady is with her view that there is an alternative, which is to say that we shall rule out entry, and that somehow that will bring down the level of the pound. That is absolute nonsense, but the hon. Lady had a point in what she said about the difficulties faced by the components industry. Practical things can be done to help. That is why I welcome, as I hope she does, the industry forum—a real partnership between the motor industry and the Government. She should welcome the accelerate programme, which is about improving skills and processes in the component industry, to help it meet the challenges ahead.

If the components industry and Rover can meet those challenges, the future will look bright. Three new models were launched at the back end of 1999. As the hon. Member for Bromsgrove said, the Rover 75 has been receiving rave reviews and was last year's car of the year according to What Car? The constant speculation about the Rover group's future and issues concerning Commission involvement in car pricing have obviously affected sales. One would not expect otherwise. However, it is good to report that the Rover 75 was the third highest selling car in its class in the second half of last year. Longbridge is already being transformed with investment for the new Mini. Changes in plant have been made to enable it to come on stream at the end of the year.

At Hams Hall in North Warwickshire, BMW is building a new engine plant and in between 18 months and two years there will be a new small to medium car. To enable that to happen, the investment must be unlocked. The European Commission needs to take a decision on the aid package, which I am confident is entirely within European rules, as quickly as possible. I hope that hon. Members will unite in conveying that message to the Commission because Rover is a strategically important industry not just for the midlands and the United Kingdom, but for the European Union. The challenge for the Commission is whether production should stay inside the European Union or should possibly move elsewhere. The facts will, I think, lead to the conclusion that the deal conforms with the rules.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is committed to a bright future for Rover, as am I. Many of my hon. Friends who represent west midlands constituencies have come here today, including my hon. Friends the Members for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), and for Worcester (Mr. Foster). My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) was here a little while ago, in addition to my hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton, North-East, for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham), for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe), and for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) as well as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston). My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) has also been here and we have been joined by my hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley). That shows the commitment of Labour Members of Parliament to the Rover group and the car industry in the west midlands. We are committed to making things work. It is up to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove and her hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State to decide whether they are equally committed, or whether they want to use the debate to make political points.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) on securing the debate. It is an opportunity to rehearse some of the important arguments on which we need to unite in coming months if the future is to be as bright as we would like. However, despite a comprehensive account from my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) other matters need to be given prominence in the debate. The strength of the pound has been mentioned, although no conclusions were reached about how to tackle that problem. It is sensible to think about Rover in terms of what we can see needs to be done.

The considerable rise in car production has been mentioned. It is at a 27-year high. Regrettably, that rise is almost wholly confined to companies other than Rover, whose figures, although by no means disgraceful, have not been contributing in a measured way to the improvement. Why is that? There has been a great commitment to improved productivity at Rover and the new management has offered leadership, which had been absent for many years. Previously, there had been massive under-investment. I can call on my working experience at what is now the Rover group, but was previously British Leyland, in commenting on this matter. Machine tools and much of the kit for producing components for British Leyland were, frankly, dug up from the bottom of the North sea after the first world war. It was appalling equipment. Little or no work was being done on new machine tool technology. At that time, it seemed to be the lean-to car company. No one was prepared to do anything to improve it. Management was as poor as it could be. There was constant friction with the work force. No one emerges from that period with any honour. All the mergers that destroyed distinguished car marques in Britain came to nothing and made things worse.

BMW has brought leadership to Rover and the workers and management have responded well. However, the cost of component manufacture for Rover is much higher than for other major car companies in Britain. That accounts almost entirely for the poor performance. It is higher, first, because of lack of investment. That is serious. I do not know whether even now some of the suppliers are putting the sort of investment into their companies that they should be putting in.

Secondly, the value of the pound and being outside the euro, with no certainty yet of going in, have exacerbated the problem. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove asked whether we could go in at DM3.20. The answer to that must obviously lie in the British economy's performance in the coming two or three years. We have heard Mr. Duisenberg say that if Britain is to find its way into the euro it must do so on the basis of the pound's having been stable against the other currencies for at least two years. That rather rules out a massive devaluation to DM2.50 or DM2.60 as the hon. Lady suggested.

In two years, greater convergence between the currencies may happen. One of the Chancellor's aims is certainly that convergence should be a major test of whether to recommend a referendum on going into the euro. That decision must be made by the British people. Hiding behind a debate on Rover, as the hon. Member for Bromsgrove has done this morning, is not helpful in that regard. She obfuscates the issue by talking of Rover without dealing with the value of the pound. She makes no suggestions about how to bring down the value of the pound. The value of the euro reflects the value of the European economy much more accurately than the pound reflects the value of our economy. We inherited that state of affairs from the Conservative Government—a massively overvalued pound and an underperforming economy. There have been improvements in Rover and in the economy. That matter is crucial to the future of Rover and the car industry in Britain.

Miss Kirkbride: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Purchase: No, because I have only a minute or two left.

The hon. Lady might not have liked my quotation from Professor Sämann, but I could give her more quotations. The chairman of Fiat made a similar case and the chief executive of the Ford Motor Company made virtually the same case. We heard this from Nissan:

"Regarding the UK's entry into EMU, I believe that, the moment the conditions are in place for a successful entry, the Government should take the UK in."

Foden Trucks—a famous name in British manufacturing—has similar sentiments. I think that the shadow Secretary of State referred to Toyota, which was clear on its position having met my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It said:

"If there is no change in the long term, then we will have to decide whether even our existing operations"— let alone expansion—

"should continue."

The situation should be set against the improving performance at Rover due to new leadership and a more inspired approach to work. The work force's agreements, conceding many practices, might have been given more willingly previously had there been a better style and class of management.

We must consider the situation in the context of our position in Europe, on which there is no going back, and the need to make real efforts to ensure that the Chancellor's five principles on entry to the euro are met in the shortest possible period. The decision to enter should be taken by the British public following a proper and reasoned debate, the like of which we have not heard from the hon. Member for Bromsgrove.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I am one of the few Members in the Chamber who does not represent a west midlands seat. If I did, I would be arguing as other hon. Members are for their constituents and for state support. I sympathise with their approach. However, I do not hold such a seat and so may enjoy the luxury of considering the subject in a wider context.

My first question concerns what is happening in the motor industry. One hon. Member painted a rosy picture of rapid production growth, but we should consider the comments made by the Consumers Association at the weekend. It said that car industry statistics were a little like election results from the former Soviet Union—they were not terribly meaningful. There is an enormous distinction between production, shipment and sales figures.

The car industry's current problems are serious. The core problem, on which the hon. Members for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) and for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) have touched, is the significance of exchange rate problems. No less a person than the chief finance officer of BMW is spelling out rather brutally the significance for the industry. He said a few days ago that BMW

"is considering a large cut in the proportion of UK manufacturers' parts for Rover cars while also invoicing existing UK suppliers in euros".

The company is moving, because of the pressure of the exchange rate, to cut back much of the industry on which many hon. Members' constituencies depend. Suppliers are being forced to take risks on the exchange rate.

I was surprised that the hon. Member for Bromsgrove mentioned the exchange rate. The word to describe that is chutzpah. It certainly was cheeky. Some of us have listened to the debates from an economic perspective. I have also understood the Conservative position to be that there is no such thing as an over-valued exchange rate. The exchange rate is what is set in the market, and exchange rate volatility is to be welcomed because that is what the market says. If the hon. Lady is now saying that the exchange rate is too high, how precisely is she proposing that it be stabilised? Those who argue for economic and monetary union membership have an answer—the trajectory may be tricky, but at least they can answer, "You fix the rate." How do you deal with the problem if you do not believe in fixing the rate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have never fixed an exchange rate.

Dr. Cable: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you have not.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East approached the subject more coherently, but raised questions that went unanswered. The exchange rate is at its present level partly because the Government chose, early in Parliament, to duck the issue of seeking an early political mandate. Had they taken that opportunity, the market would have been given different signals and the exchange rate would almost certainly have been trading at a much lower rate.

However, that is history. For the future, we have Mr. Duisenberg's alarming pronouncement. He is taking the hard line that the British are acting from a weak bargaining position as late joiners who will take the conditions on offer. We are now being told that a two-year period will be enforced, meaning that we would be expected to enter in two years' time at the clearly over-valued current rate. In its report last week, the International Monetary Fund showed that a proper equilibrium rate would be DM2.80, which is way below the present level.

If we do not accept that view of the future, the timetable will have to be postponed, with effects on other parts of the car industry. Toyota and others are asking what future they have in the U[illegible]. There is much uncertainty. More than anything else, the debate highlights the huge uncertainty created as a spillover from our not having the EMU entry strategy clarified.

The second issue raised was the Commission inquiry into state aids. I fully sympathise with hon. Members wanting us to get the right result—I hope that we do, too. The Commission's questions about mobility, to use its jargon, are valid. It is questioning whether BMW really had an alternative of going to Hungary. When one studies BMW's published thinking, it is clear that it never seriously intended to do that. Its strategy all along was to be a volume car producer, not to build a branch plant in Hungary. In the long term, its deliberate and systematic involvement with Rover satisfied the strategy. If that was true, British state aid was not needed because its investment was going to proceed anyway. That is the nub of the Commission inquiry. I hope, now that Britain has made the decision, that the Commission finds in our favour. However, it is asking a valid question.

My third point concerns the other Commission inquiry, which has not yet been mentioned, and which has major implications for Rover and the industry generally. It brings into focus a conflict between two Government objectives. It is clear from the Rover decision that the Government are concerned to help the car industry. However, they are also concerned about rip-off Britain, high British car prices and the current block exemption given for the marketing of cars.

From most of the inquiries, the difference between UK and continental car prices clearly benefits not only dealers and car fleet buyers, but the car manufacturing industry. The choice is painful: if we went for cheaper cars for British consumers, there would be a substantial knock-on effect and damage to the industry. I suspect that the authorities can do little about the situation—internet buying is proceeding so rapidly, with so much transhipment of goods, that the car industry's position is being undermined anyway.

The decision has already been made—the Government have committed the money. We hope that the expectations are realised and that productivity improves. However, because of what has happened to exchange rates and because of doubts surrounding the two Commission inquiries, we are led to ask serious questions about whether the continued recourse to large-scale state aid for the car industry is a good use of industrial policy.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I should begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) on bringing the debate to the Chamber. One of our great concerns has been that, although the issue has been in the limelight since the announcement last June, there has been no formal representation by Government to the House. I listened carefully to other hon. Members, who clearly have a genuine constituency interest in the matter. They were mealy-mouthed in their support for my hon. Friend having secured the debate. Any of them could have brought the subject to the House during the past seven months.

The matter is important not only to the midlands but nationally. When the announcement was made, it would have been more appropriate for the Secretary of State to make a statement in the House in June because of the size and importance of the company. That would have allowed hon. Members to ask the many questions precipitated by the announcement. More questions have arisen subsequently.

I believe that one hon. Member, although I cannot remember who, said that he hoped that I would not be party political. Would I be? I draw it to the attention of the Chamber that the first I heard about the Secretary of State's announcement was from a press release dated 22 June, which says,

"Rover deal—Invitation to a photocall."

As a result of the Secretary of State making his announcement in a photo call to the press at 9.30 am, the House was denied the opportunity to ask questions at the outset. I was unable to ask questions from the Dispatch Box, so I followed the route with which I am now becoming only too familiar, which is to table parliamentary questions. Tabling questions to the

[Mrs. Angela Browning]

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and extracting answers from him is becoming my life's work, so much so that I am tempted to patent it and sell it to Waddington's. However, we all recognise the importance of the announcement, which was welcomed throughout the House.

Mr. Burden: On a matter of accuracy, as the hon. Lady might be aware, the announcement was made by the Prime Minister during Prime Minister's Question Time in the House.

Mrs. Browning: Surely, a proper statement with the necessary time for questions would have been the most appropriate way for the Government to make an announcement. There have been opportunities for the odd oral question, but that is hardly the point. Clearly, when the announcement was made, it raised issues of concern about the Commission's role. We were reassured by the Secretary of State and the Department of Trade and Industry that all would be well, not least because of the concern about mobility which, as the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) rightly said, is at the heart of the matter and of the investigation that has since been carried out by the Commission. On 25 June, a spokesman for the Department of Trade and Industry said that the Department was confident that BMW would be able to demonstrate that the project was mobile. Unfortunately, despite those reassurances, the discussions that were held and the preparations that were made prior to the announcement clearly did not go into the sort of detail that might have avoided the extended delay that now exists.

My hon. Friend has outlined how important the matter is, not only to the 9,000 employees at Rover in Longbridge, but to the many businesses in the midlands and elsewhere that supply Rover. As part of my attempt to get answers from the Secretary of State, I asked him about that matter in a written question. From representations that I have received—not only from small suppliers, but from machine tool suppliers, for example—I know that there is concern that a lot of German equipment will now be used in the factory where, previously, UK suppliers had been involved. Among the questions that I asked the Secretary of State in June last year, I asked him to list the criteria under which Government investment in Rover was expected to meet best value. I also asked him what the impact was likely to be on suppliers. Again, I had to prod for an answer, and only when I prodded by way of a letter in August last year did I eventually receive a reply in writing from the Secretary of State, in September.

One of our concerns is the way in which the Government have handled the information. Perhaps, on this glorious day of 1,000 days, there is an opportunity for the Minister to recognise—

Mr. Purchase: One thousand and one.

Mrs. Browning: I stand corrected if it is 1,001. On this glorious day, we are celebrating an excellent floor cleaner.

The delay is causing uncertainty, adding to the speculation about the future, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) said, not just for Rover, but for the many other companies who supply Rover. I quoted from Mr. Van Miert's response immediately after the announcement was made in June. We all understand the process, which is that announcements are made before any formal application to the Commission is submitted, but we must consider the time and sequence of events. The fact that the Secretary of State rushed to his photo call when he arrived on a plane from China, where he had received some bad publicity, suggests that the art of the spin doctor was at work. It would be risible, were it not for the fact that when spin doctors take precedence in the timing of such an announcement, the proper procedures are not followed and preparations are not properly made. The correspondence between me and Mr. Van Miert's office just a few days later showed clearly that the Commission would have expected and welcomed more detailed consultation with the Government before the announcement was made. I hope that the Minister will learn the lesson that, in matters of such importance when, some seven months later, so many British suppliers are faced with uncertainty, there is a proper place for scrutiny of such an announcement, and that is in the House following the correct representations to the Commission.

This debate is about the future, which, as we have heard, will not be known for another two or three months. Will the Minister update us all on her understanding of the timetable before us? We all accept that there will be a delay. Clearly, the Commission needs to make its inquiries. However, a timetable would add stability because it would enable people to plan. People find it most distressing if they do not know what the time scale is likely to be. If the Minister is unable to make that commitment today, perhaps she would agree to put the information in the House of Commons Library within the next few days. That information must be important to Rover and it will certainly be important to Rovers' suppliers, from whom I receive an increasing number of letters and who need to make long-term plans. If that information is not forthcoming, the uncertainty will continue.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend has emphasised the importance of clarity in these matters. Could we not take a collective decision on behalf of the Chamber to press the Minister to ensure that the urgency that has been expressed today is communicated to the Commission? We really need to clear this up as soon as we can, in the interests of Rover and all its suppliers.

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend is right. We have no choice but to accept that there will be further delay, but if the delay could be timetabled realistically, it would take some of the sting out of the wait. As the hon. Member for Northfield said, BMW has made a commitment and is already building new factories. We should take hope and encouragement from that, but clearly any questions that remain unanswered, especially surrounding the £152 million that the Government have agreed in funding, should be underpinned by a detailed timetable.

In conclusion, there has been much discussion about the high pound. I asked what representations the Secretary of State makes on behalf of key industries and manufacturers—I asked that question in respect of Toyota in particular—because the right hon. Gentleman may have made representations to the Bank of England Monetary Policy Committee on behalf of the car manufacturing industry in the UK. It would be nice to know—if the Minister is unable to reply today, I can table more questions to the Secretary of State because that has a regular slot in my diary—about the nature of those representations. I recall being chided by the Secretary of State for opposing the way in which the Government handed over control of our economy to the Monetary Policy Committee, but if Ministers make formal representations in what is supposed to be a hands-off Government operation, that information should be shared with the House and put on the record.

As for the single currency, to which many Labour Members referred—they are obviously devotees—there is a misunderstanding about who decides at what rate we should enter it. I advise all hon. Members to read, if they have not done so, article 1091(5) of the Treaty on European Union. It spells out that we, the United Kingdom, do not determine at what rate we join the single currency. Member states will decide that by unanimity. It makes sense that they would not set a rate that would severely disadvantage them or advantage us. We are not masters of our own destiny. The treaty makes that clear. In terms of what is and is not a good rate apropos the deutschmark, I remind hon. Members, because it was a stinging experience for those of us who were in government at the time, that we fell out of the exchange rate mechanism at about DM2.75.

The Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I readily congratulate the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) on securing the debate. This matter is of enormous importance, not only to those who work in the car industry in the west midlands, especially at Rover, but to the future of the car industry in the United Kingdom and the European Union. I am also grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for enabling the debate to proceed by ruling that in this Chamber it is Wednesday even though in the main Chamber it is still Tuesday.

Both sides of the Chamber has voiced support for Rover and its work force and management, and for BMW's commitment to that company and those people. There were some well-informed speeches, in particular that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), who has for months played an active part in helping to secure the future of the Longbridge plant. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) also made an excellent speech. He referred to the troubled past of Rover, from which it is now emerging.

Rover is a great British brand, but there has been too much talking down of its prospects. I regret to say that even the hon. Lady has participated in that.

Mrs. Browning: I dispute that. The Minister did not read the press release that I issued on the day that the Secretary of State made his announcement, in which I stated:

"I am delighted about the Rover plant in Longbridge and that jobs have been saved."

I made it clear, however, that there would be many questions. The headlines of the press release said: "Good News for Midlands, but there are important questions that need to be answered." I gave my total support.

Ms Hewitt: I was referring to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove, not the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). Perhaps the hon. Lady has forgotten that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who was her predecessor in the shadow Cabinet post that she holds, opposed state aid. He said that he was not in favour of large public investment to help regions that are hit by job losses and refused to support our decision to give state aid, linked to productivity improvers, to Rover and BMW.

Mr. Snape: Does my hon. Friend agree that at least the right hon. Member for Wokingham has the virtue of consistency, unlike the hon. Member for Bromsgrove who, in her previous incarnation as a reporter on The Daily Telegraph, denounced state interference, as she would put it, in industry? As a Member of the House, she has often denounced state involvement in the private sector, except when it benefits her constituents.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend puts his finger on the absolute confusion in the Opposition's economic policy.

It is worth reminding the Chamber of the real successes that Rover is achieving. In the past decade, it has been the third largest British exporter after British Aerospace and BP. The Rover 75 has won a number of awards, both at home and internationally, including the car of the year award from What Car? It was also voted world car 1999 by top automotive journalists. Land Rover is an enormous success story. Last year, it increased sale by another 16 per cent. to take it to a record level. The Range Rover was the best selling luxury car after Jaguar in Britain last year. Thanks to BMW's investment of more than £3 billion—there is much more to come—and the commitment of the Rover work force and management, the company's prospects are excellent. We need to understand the debate in that context.

The hon. Member for Bromsgrove and other hon. Members referred to European approval for state aid. There are no rules that require member states to inform the European Commission about proposed investments before they are announced publicly, but it is British Government practice to do that, which is what happened with Rover. Our offer of grant to Rover-BMW was conditional on the securing of European Union approval. That was known to BMW when the offer was made and it has been announced several times publicly.

[Ms Hewitt]

I am in no doubt that, without the offer of support, BMW would have taken its investment elsewhere. It needed to go ahead with the investment for strategic reasons, but it did not need to come to the UK. The prime consideration for BMW was the impact of the additional investment on the company's overall financial position at a time when Rover cars were incurring significant losses and when an alternative economically viable production site in Hungary was an option. I regret that the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) has cast doubt on that position. The substantial information that has been supplied to the European Commission since the aid was notified fully bears it out.

Mr. Burden: It is worth saying that the Hungary option was being seriously talked about a long time before the European Commission decided to examine the issue. On 11 March last year, The Independent quoted BMW's industrial relations director as describing the Hungary option as "a serious alternative" to Longbridge.

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who bears out the evidence that has been submitted to the European Commission.

In December, Commissioner Monti announced that he was opening a procedure on the Longbridge case because of his desire to introduce transparency into all such notification of aid by member states. Rover is not being singled out for special attention. The Commission has announced procedures in other recent cases involving Volkswagen and Fiat. It has said that it will apply the approach in all cases of state aid to the car industry.

We have given the European Commission a great deal of information—more than sufficient to support our case and I am hopeful of a successful conclusion to the review. However, when Conservative Members ask that we now stress to the Commission the need for an urgent decision on the matter, I have to ask where they have been for the past few months. We have consistently stressed to the Commissioner and his officials the need for an early decision on the application so that BMW can proceed with the investment and meet the timetable for the new car. I am pleased to say that Commissioner Monti has given my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State his assurance that the Commission will deal with the matter with due speed. There is no fixed timetable for that process. It is a matter for the Commission, not for the Government.

We shall continue to urge the need for an early decision and we will continue to keep closely in touch with Rover-BMW on the progress that is being made in our discussions with the European Union, just as we keep it in touch with the progress of the European Commission's review. By the time of the next board meeting it will be fully up to date with the status of the review.

I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members feel as I do—that the European Commission needs to streamline and speed up its decision making. I am pleased that the new president of the Commission, Romano Prodi, and the vice-president, Neil Kinnock—a former right hon. Member of the House—are driving forward a modernisation and reform programme to achieve precisely that. Indeed, the Commission has just launched a review of the motor vehicles framework that will include considering the process and the timetable. Its conclusions are expected by the summer.

Miss Kirkbride: Will the Minister say when her Department last spoke to Commissioner Monti about the Rover deal? As a consequence of that conversation, were her officials assured that the information needed by the Commission to form a view had been handed over by Her Majesty's Government?

Ms Hewitt: As I said, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has spoken recently to Commissioner Monti and we are satisfied that the European Commission has more than enough information upon which to base its decision.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northfield and others referred to the Rover supply chain and the uncertainty for many companies, especially those in the west midlands, who have supplied Rover for many years. We must all understand that for Rover to maintain and improve its future competitive position it must have a world-class supply base to match the world-class production facility that BMW will build at Longbridge with its proposed investment.

Throughout the world, not simply in the United Kingdom or the European Union, vehicle manufacturers have been rationalising their supply chain, reducing the number of suppliers that they deal with and trying to secure the economies of scale and technological innovation that can be offered by global suppliers, using the platform now available of intranet and electronic data exchange. Rover-BMW is no exception to that trend. It will certainly mean some difficult decisions, but I am confident that the British suppliers will be able to meet the challenge.

I stress that the rationalisation of the supply chain would take place in any case. The exchange rate issue is only one element of it. Vehicle manufacturing is an intensely competitive sector—that is true worldwide, but it is particularly true in the European market. It means that the car industry, and manufacturing generally, must keep ahead of the game and develop and adopt lean manufacturing techniques and electronic commerce. International comparisons on stock level are a key measure of the success of lean manufacturing and in that respect the United Kingdom's automotive component industry compares well with that of the United States and very favourably with the European industry. That is a testimony to the increasing competitiveness of our supply base.

The Government and the industry know that there is still more to do. That is why we support the industry's efforts to improve its competitiveness through the industry forum that was established by the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, the trade association. That is a unique initiative which aims to develop and sustain world-leading competitiveness in the UK-based vehicle and components industry, by ensuring that suppliers develop and adopt world-class manufacturing improvement activity and training. Of course, Rover-BMW is closely and actively involved in those important initiatives.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Before the debate ends—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate has just ended. Time is up.

UK Wine Industry

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce what I believe to be the first debate in the House on the United Kingdom wine industry for almost 16 years.

I want to make it clear at the start of the debate that I am not a wine-snob; I have never been able to understand those people who can describe wines as being like a walk down a lane in the autumn sunset and so on. Like most hon. Members, I know what I like—[Interruption.].

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. In fairness to the hon. Gentleman, would Members please withdraw quietly if they are leaving the Chamber?

Mr. Oaten: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Like many members of the public I have always had a preconception about English wine and I confess that until recently it was very negative. I was therefore delighted to be able to taste the wines at Wickham Vineyard in my constituency. I was pleasantly surprised that they tasted superb. The owners of the vineyard had arranged a meeting with the owners of other vineyards in the region who raised several issues about the industry with me. I shall use this short debate to try to raise some of them with the Minister.

There are some surprising facts about the United Kingdom wine industry. For example, I had not realised that because of climate changes resulting in hot summers, the south of England might soon become one of the optimum wine-growing regions. Traditionally, southern France and Spain have been ideal areas for growing wines but they may become too hot. Thus, the south of England could be the best area for good wines.

Members may be surprised to know that there about 400 separate vineyards in the UK. That is not bad for a country that supposedly does not produce and make wine. I understand that the royal household toasted the millennium with a United Kingdom wine: Nyetimber, a sparkling white wine that is grown and made in Sussex. Why Nyetimber? Because it is an internationally recognised wine that has won a number of competitions. It won the sparkling wine category at the Wine and Spirit International competition, beating 8,000 other wines, including the famous Moët. English wines have much to celebrate. There is clearly potential for the industry to grow, and that potential needs to be realised.

We can take encouragement from what has happened in the world in the past 10 or 15 years. The wine industry is full of success stories about upstarts. Ten years ago, people would have laughed at anyone who said that he was buying wine from Australia, New Zealand, Chile or Argentina, but they have been very successful. Wine growers in those countries have been able to market themselves and have caused the French major anxiety. If we get things right, given the climate changes, there is a chance that in 10 years' time wines from United Kingdom will tell the same success story as those from Australia and New Zealand. The Government could help. I shall suggest ways in which they can do so, to which I hope the Minister will have a chance to respond.

[Mr. Oaten]

European Union laws prohibit us from labelling our wines "quality wines". I shall deal with that and with the use of pesticides and some of the wine industry's concerns about having a level playing field on those issues. I have some questions about the UK licensing laws and the controversial matter of the financial support that the Government can give industry. I want, too, to discuss the positive campaign that the Government could initiate and lead by using more UK wines themselves.

I begin with quality wine versus table wine labelling. At present, a £5 bottle of good UK wine is labelled table wine and a £5 bottle of good French wine is labelled "appellation controleé", which means quality wine. The UK wine industry has rightly asked why it cannot label its wines as quality wines. Although French and UK wines are clearly as good as each other, EU law states that we cannot call most of our wines quality wines because many are produced from hybrid, not pedigree, grapes. A long time ago, hybrid grapes used to have a strange taste, but since then flavours have been modified and perfected, and they now taste just as good as pedigree grapes.

The EU law on labelling is desperately out of date and must be modernised. Pedigree grapes do not make economic sense for the UK wine industry, which must rely on hybrid grapes to survive events such as June mildew. In establishing whether a wine should be labelled a quality wine, the EU must address, not the variety of grape used, but whether the wine tastes good.

Certain other countries are ignoring EU regulations on labelling. Hybrid new world wines that are exported to the UK are labelled as quality wines, but our quality hybrid sourced wine is labelled—one might almost say branded—as a table wine. Something must be done to solve that problem. The Government have tried to help, but they should do more. Their regional wine scheme allows quality UK wines to be called "English counties regional wine", but that is not a great marketing tool with which to take on the rest of the world. More must be done to change EU law, so that our wines can be called quality wines.

There are two ways in which that can be achieved. The first—which I do not recommend, but which the industry wants the Government to consider—is to follow the German Government's example and flout EU laws by allowing our good-quality hybrid-sourced wine to be labelled as quality wine. The second option, which the Minister should consider carefully, is for the Government to give a rock-solid commitment to renegotiate a change in EU law, so that our quality wines can be recognised.

Pesticides and controlling the way in which grapes grow are important issues for the industry. Up to 30 per cent. of grapes are lost each year through mildew. Controlling such losses is clearly essential, because they can devastate businesses in the growing industry. Pesticides to combat problems such as mildew exist and are used by our EC competitors in France and Germany. However, the UK wine industry is unable to use many pesticides because licensing them in this country is too expensive. Licensing the right to use a pesticide can cost a vineyard more than £35,000. Vineyards with small budgets soon discover that such a cost can wipe out the year's profits.

The Government should put pressure on the EC to harmonise EU licensing regulations, so that wine growers in this country can use pesticides that are already licensed elsewhere in the EU. It would be logical for wine growers that have passed EU environmental and safety controls to be permitted to use that licence in this country, rather than go through a separate licensing process which, as I have said, can cost more than £35,000. That would help to provide a level playing field and the necessary tools to overcome problems such as mildew.

I referred to the industry's concerns about licensing laws. If I were a craftsman, I would not stay in my workshop and wait for customers to come to me; I would go out and sell my product. Wine makers are no different, but the licensing laws make it difficult for them to do that. Wine makers want to attend farmers' markets and agricultural fairs. In the past year, the number of town markets has increased and they have proved popular. At any market in France, one sees local wine growers selling their wines and people sampling them. However, our licensing laws make it difficult for UK wine growers to do the same. Even a wine maker who is licensed to sell wine in his own vineyard must apply for a different licence, spend the morning in court and pay extra money whenever he wants to sell his produce at a market. Wine makers with a certain type of licence are sometimes not allowed to sell wine at markets at all.

Everyone wants proper licensee controls to protect youngsters, for example, from alcohol, but there seems to be little danger that licensing laws will be flouted at agricultural fairs or markets by under-age buying. Such markets offer regional wine growers an ideal opportunity not only to sell direct to the public but to influence local businesses and opinion-formers. At the moment, that opportunity is being missed.

The benefits in reforming the law are clear and I ask the Minister to make representations to the Home Office, so that wine makers can apply for a yearly licence that would enable them to attend markets and agricultural fairs. That would be preferable to the overly bureaucratic process of applying for a licence for each event, even where that event takes place monthly.

It is almost lunchtime and I hope that hon. Members will enjoy a sip of wine with their lunch. However, before I conclude, I have a few more points to make about the wine industry. If hon. Members do not know of Wickham Vineyard, which is in my constituency, I invite them to familiarise themselves. Wickham Vineyard supplies the oaked white wine that is available in the Palace of Westminster. I hope that the Minister has tasted it and was suitably impressed. I urge her to encourage her ministerial colleagues to taste English wine—not only wines from my consituency—and to ensure that it is served at official functions. For example, the Department could break with tradition at its next Christmas party and serve UK wine. The Government could ensure that English wine is served at more official civic functions. If the Government were to take that lead, they would boost the industry by showing the world that we are proud of our wine and happy to serve it.

Finally, on the financial support that the Government could give to the industry, they seem strangely unaware of the cross-channel wine trade's impact on UK wine sales. There is a big difference between wine excise duties in the UK and France. In the UK, duty is £1.12 a bottle and in France, it is only 2p a bottle. It is not surprising that, since 1993, when the law was changed, Britons have hopped across the channel and brought back vast quantities of French wine, which I do not doubt was for their own consumption. As a result, UK wine sales have decreased and the impact has been greatest in areas close to the channel tunnel in the south, which is where most vineyards are located. Despite optimism about the industry's potential, one in five vineyards has gone out of business since 1993. Prior to that date and the changes to the licensing laws, the industry was growing.

Is the Minister worried about the channel tunnel trade's impact on the industry? I am not so naive as to suggest that the excise duty, which brings money to the Exchequer, should be reduced. I accept that we must live in the real world, but the Minister must acknowledge that the UK wine industry is suffering as a result of that income. Does the Minister recognise that this is a growing industry that needs our support and does she agree that the Government should consider measures to encourage it?

The Government have rightly provided the cider industry with a considerable subsidy by allowing the first 7,000 litres of cider to be sold excise free. That measure has had a big impact. I have corresponded with the Minister on this issue and I understand that there are technical reasons why the UK wine industry cannot be granted a similar subsidy. However, the principle of Government subsidy for the cider industry, which I support, should, for the same reasons, be extended to the wine industry.

The UK wine industry has shown, through competition, that it can be successful. We know that the climate is changing, and we need to grasp that opportunity. World markets appear to be opening up, and, with good marketing, the public's attitude to wines have changed considerably. They are not now so wedded to the traditional idea of French wine; they are prepared to explore a range of wines from different parts of the country. The industry now needs a kick start and a boost.

I hope that the Minister will address the points that I have made about better labelling, because the UK industry will be held back until we can have quality wine. Until we have a level playing field relating to pesticides, 30 per cent. of crops could continue to be wiped out each year. We also need to address the licensing laws. Above all, I hope that the Minister will use this opportunity to give a commitment that the Government will try to use UK wine more freely in civic functions. I hope that they will also get behind the industry and support a big marketing campaign, so that we can proudly say to the world that our wines can compete, and so that, in 10 years, it will be quite common for UK wines to be up there with Australian and French wines.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Ms Joyce Quin): I welcome the opportunity to respond to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) in this short debate. It is a pleasure to see you, my constituency neighbour in the north-east, presiding over it, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Gentleman said that this had been the first debate on UK wine for 16 years. I am sure that he is correct; I certainly do not remember one during my time in the House. I am glad that he has given us the opportunity of raising issues that are of concern to the UK wine industry and its future. The hon. Gentleman's constituency contains vineyards and his county, Hampshire, contains about 10 per cent. of the vineyards in the United Kingdom. I therefore understand his interest in the issue.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the question of climate. He expressed the opinion that, given the climate changes that we have already witnessed, and those that may happen, the prospects for the UK wine industry will be very different. However, we need to retain a sense of realism. Evidence of the favourability of climate is not so strong. Although the weather has become warmer, those warm days can give way to cold, clear skies at night, especially in the early spring, and frosts have been known to damage the early growth of the vine. The question of climate is not, therefore, entirely straightforward. We shall bear it in mind as we examine the future of the UK wine industry, but it may be too soon to make any definite predictions of how it may affect the industry's expansion.

The hon. Gentleman made the point that we are part of the European Union and its agricultural regime, and that the wine industry must operate in the context of the Community's wine regime. The rules of that regime are complex, and we are taking a keen interest in recent proposals to change it. We are interested in the effects that those changes would have not only on the European Union wine industry as a whole, but on the UK industry and its prospects.

Those complex rules often appear, to both growers and Governments, to have been designed to benefit the larger, more established wine-producing members, sometimes to the detriment of smaller-scale producers and of the UK industry. However, the Government defended the interests of the UK wine industry during this year's review of the wine regime as part of Agenda 2000, and established important pointers for the future.

There will be no changes in the permitted wine-making practices. The present arrangement for enrichment with sugar for deacidification, and for minimum natural sugar levels, will continue. That contrasts with a proposal for reform several years ago, which, if implemented, would have created serious problems for the domestic industry. Equally important is that no ban on new vines will be imposed on the United Kingdom until average production over five years exceeds 25,000 hectolitres a year. Despite the hon. Gentleman's confident predictions, it is unlikely that we shall exceed that amount, given that our present production level stands at about 15,000 hectolitres. That would be a rather dramatic expansion. We are, therefore, glad that our position was safeguarded in the recent round of negotiations.

The hon. Gentleman rightly drew our attention to the matter of hybrids, and their use in the wine industry. English and Welsh producers are penalised because the ban on the production of quality wine from non-pure wine varieties—non-Vitis vinifera varieties—will continue. It is also clear that the hybrid varieties in our climate have much to contribute to the success of our industry, as well as being environmentally friendly. The hon. Gentleman was right about the use of hybrid varieties elsewhere in the world.

For those reasons, the Government insisted, and the European Council agreed, that the Commission should finance an independent study into inter-specific varieties, and report to the Council, if appropriate, with proposals for amendment and modification. That report will not be completed until 2003, which sounds like a leisurely timetable. However, one realises that that is not the case when one thinks of the physical requirements of the tests and studies to be carried out in order to provide the database in the European Union that we will be able to use in future.

I commend to the hon. Gentleman the Government's achievement during those negotiations in getting that study under way. Many fierce interests we defended in any negotiation on the European Union wine industry, so agreement on the study was an extremely useful outcome for us. We hope that it will provide the possibility for change.

The new regime, agreed under Agenda 2000, is designed more closely to align production with demand in the European Union. However, it will place no additional requirements on our producers, There are financial schemes available to Community wine producers that have not been available to producers in the UK, but much of that expenditure has been, and will continue to be, on market management arrangements designed to tackle surpluses and chronically low prices in parts of the European Union.

Obviously, English and Welsh wine is not in surplus, and can, and does—in line with the arguments about quality that the hon. Gentleman advanced—command relatively high prices. The decisions that have been made at European level are aimed at a problem that we do not have. Furthermore, member states in which market control mechanisms are in operation have accompanying compulsory requirements, in the form of red tape, that would be inappropriate for our industry, which prides itself on quality and innovation and would not welcome being subject to requirements that are designed to tackle problems that are specific to certain regions of the European Union.

Quality and innovation are the keys to the commercial success of our wine producers, even though the commercial environment in which they operate is demanding. A few years ago, in order to support and encourage our producers, the then Government—I am not making party political points at the moment—introduced a quality wine scheme that promotes high standards through compulsory analytical and organoleptic tests—in other words, professional tests on quality standards.

As the hon. Gentleman said, a similar regional wine scheme, which permits the use of hybrids, was recently introduced. As he expressed some doubts as to the real value of that scheme, I point out to him that it was introduced at the industry's request, and represented a joint attempt by the industry and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to draw consumers' attention to the variety and quality of our wines. It is better to have that scheme, which covers a variety of areas and kinds of wine, than no scheme at all.

The success of the scheme is monitored by a joint industry and MAFF committee, which meets regularly to discuss and make amendments to the rules in the light of experience, and to consider and evaluate matters such as evolving market conditions. That leads me to the obvious but important point that my Department is keen to work actively and continually with the industry on all the issues that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, in order both to avoid disadvantaging the industry unfairly in Europe and to look at ways of moving the industry forward in future.

It is possible for the wine industry to apply for grants under some of the schemes that the Government have introduced in recent months. For example, UK wine producers have shown some interest in the agricultural marketing scheme. The Government have brought forward similar schemes as part of their proposals for the rural development regulation.

The Government would be able to consider expenditure for the UK wine industry under Community finance for restructuring. However, it would be up to the industry to come forward with a well-thought-out and detailed plan at the appropriate time. Funds are not likely to be large and, as the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members will know, there is currently huge pressure for available funds from agriculture in general, given the difficulties that are faced by several sectors. Given the nature of that competition, I do not want to sound over-optimistic. However, the possibility exists, and it will be for the industry to consider whether it can take advantage of it.

I shall try to touch on other matters that the hon. Gentleman raised. As he will understand, the level of excise duty is a matter for the Chancellor. Although it is an important issue, we cannot grant producers discriminatory preference on the basis of their location in the UK. We must not fall foul of European rules in that way. Respect for European rules is absolutely crucial at the present time, and I would not want to flout them—as the hon. Gentleman suggested at one point—especially given our difficulties with disrespect for the rules on the part of the French.

Mr. Deptuty Speaker: Order. Time is up.

NHS Complaints

1.26 pm

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I am pleased to have been given this opportunity to highlight the campaign by my constituent, Mr. Raymond Hook, who is here today, to get to the bottom of the circumstances surrounding the tragic death of his beloved wife, Vicki, on 5 April 1996. In doing so, I shall describe the shoddy way in which Mr. Hook has been treated and the inadequacies of current NHS complaints procedures and, I hope, make a powerful case for the reform of those procedures. I shall also be seeking an assurance from the Minister that she will use her powers to grant the independent medical review for which Mr. Hook has been striving, and to which he is entitled.

Before I continue, I apologise if my delivery is somewhat less energetic than usual. I am suffering from that dreadful flu bug—although not badly enough to prevent me from pressing my constituent's case.

I am aware that there is considerable media interest in the case, and I have been critical of the way in which Mr. Hook has been treated by the NHS. However, I also wish to put on the record my appreciation of the NHS in Berkshire, which coped with unprecedented pressures over Christmas and the millennium period. Those were made worse by the flu virus that I have brought with me today. I have seen a report to the board of Berkshire health authority on its performance over the holiday period, and it makes a mockery of the recent over-hyped scare stories about the NHS that have been appearing in some sections of the national press.

It is worth highlighting three points from the report. First, the detailed planning paid off, and the extra moneys that were made available by the Government were put into primary care, thereby protecting the emergency beds and helping the NHS to cope with the flu outbreak. Secondly, waiting lists were shown to have risen by less than would normally be expected under such circumstances. Thirdly, there was only minimal disruption to the work of the acute hospitals, and they were soon back to carrying out routine elective surgery. That is clearly at odds with the attempts of some of our newspapers to portray our health service as an organisation in deep crisis.

I shall now describe the plight of my constituent, Mr. Hook, and the less than satisfactory service that he has received from the local health authority. Mr. Hook came to see me at one of my regular advice surgeries on 27 March last year, some three years after his wife's death from a brain tumour. Since that time, apart from a period of intense grieving, Mr. Hook has been tirelessly seeking to get to the truth as to why his wife Vicki was not referred by her GP, Dr. Sanders, for a scan in time for medical treatment that stood a good chance of success. He has exhausted all the avenues that are open to him in the face of obstruction and intransigence from the Medical Defence Union and bureaucratic delays, including the unforgivable loss of medical records by the health service management. Mr. Hook has been to the health service ombudsman, who, tragically, could not help. Although his jurisdiction to cover complaints about GPs had recently been extended, it only covered events that occurred on or after 1 April 1996.

The alleged misdiagnosis by Dr. Sanders occurred in January 1996, less than three months short of the qualifying date.

Mr. Hook made his first complaint through the national health service complaints procedure in March 1997, 11 months after his wife's death, and immediately fell foul of the rule stating that a complaint must be received within six months. I do not know how a bureaucrat can be so brutal and heartless as to construct a set of rules that take no account of the depth of grief and loss incurred by someone. It is fundamentally wrong to treat a complaint about plastic surgery in the same way as a complaint about the loss of a life.

After much argument and delay, the objections were overcome and Mr. Hook was offered local resolution. He was told that his complaint would be investigated by the head of the general practice concerned. That led to the second problem—Dr. Sanders was the head of the practice concerned. How could that local resolution be satisfactory? Understandably, Mr. Hook refused local resolution and took his complaint direct to Berkshire health authority. A hearing was established under a convenor in January 1998 to consider an independent review of Mr. Hook's complaint against Dr. Sanders. Despite the ruling that, with hindsight, Dr. Sanders' diagnosis was incorrect, the convenor rejected Mr. Hook's request and he was again referred to the ombudsman. To add insult to injury, Mr. Hook was denied access to the clinical advice that was made available to the convenor. That was monstrously unfair and unjust.

In May 1998, Mr. Hook again wrote to the health service ombudsman outlining the circumstances of his wife's death as he saw them and the failure of Dr. Sanders to refer Vicki to a neurological consultant as a matter of urgency, despite advice from her optician. Tragically, an appointment with a neurologist was received for 24 June 1996, 11 weeks after Vicki's death.

Vicki's medical records for the preceding four years showed constant headaches, blurred vision, double vision, extreme tiredness and the comment "all very bizarre". Despite that, when she visited Dr. Sanders on 12 January, she was told that there was nothing to worry about and that there was only a problem of tunnel vision. During the February of her last year, Vicki's condition continued to deteriorate and she had become incontinent. Dr. Sanders then called in a psychiatrist, who sent Vicki to a psychiatric hospital, which arranged for her to see a consultant neurologist, Dr. Hyam, who immediately arranged a brain scan for the next day. That scan revealed that Vicki had a brain tumour in an advanced state. She was transferred to the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford and died in the intensive care unit following a biopsy on 5 April 1996. Subsequently, Dr. Sanders told Mr. Hook and his daughter that in his opinion the tumour had been forming over the previous four years and that he would have done things differently with hindsight. At around that time, some of Vicki's medical records mysteriously went missing from the local hospital trust in Reading.

Hopeful that the ombudsman would find in his favour, Mr. Hook was shattered to be told that he was still falling foul of the 1 April 1996 rule. He had been sent, deliberately, round the same circle a second time for no purpose.

Not being someone to give up, Mr. Hook commissioned his own medical report. Having finally obtained the necessary medical records, Dr. Rogers produced a devastating critique of the situation on

[Mr. Martin Salter]

6 October 1998. It claimed that Vicki Hook should have been admitted to a medical ward much earlier and that, if she had been, it was possible that her life could have been saved. Mr. Hook then presented his new evidence to Berkshire health authority in November 1998 in support of his call for a full, independent, medical review. That was rejected and as the local community health council was unable to help and he had exhausted the NHS complaints procedures, his only remaining option was to seek the help of his Member of Parliament.

I have the greatest respect fo the new chairman of Berkshire health authority, Mr. Bernard Williams, but it was he who eventually ruled that Mr. Hook could not have an independent medical review because Dr. Rogers' work constituted a new opinion rather than new evidence and, furthermore, it was felt that such a move would be liable to a procedural challenge by the Medical Defence Union and result in a field day for lawyers. That is a stunning indictment of the NHS complaints procedures.

I have read the recent evaluation of the effectiveness of the complaints procedures, which was published in September last year by the Public Law Project. It provides instructive but unpleasant reading for those who are responsible for the NHS. For example, it criticises local resolution because it lacks impartiality and transparency. It is scathing about the ability to deal with complaints that raise serious questions about performance, conduct or competence, which may place patients' lives at risk. In other words, it is high time that the conflicts of interest and the impression of professional collusion and cover-up were ended. The report calls for greater independence and efficiency in the establishment of independent reviews.

My constituent, Mr. Hook, asked me to make some specific points when pressing for reform of the NHS complaints system. First, time limits should allow for a proper period of grieving. Secondly, local resolution cannot be achieved with an individual GP practice when the complaint involves the head of the practice or anyone in that practice without some independent input. Thirdly, why are people told that they have only six months in which to lodge a complaint, when it took Berkshire health authority 12 months to decide not to grant an independent medical review? There must be an open and transparent appeals process. Fifthly, relatives of deceased patients must be told of their right to see copies of the patient's medical notes. Finally, is it right that the GP who provides the first medical assessment of the complaint may be drawn from the same health authority area?

I want to read a short extract from Mr. Hook's last letter to me, which makes the case for action more powerfully than I ever could. It states:

"I can fully understand why people stop trying to see an independent review with what I have had to go through for the last three years and I feel it would be better if people's hopes of obtaining an independent review were not put up as an option in the first place. This merely adds to the cruelty of the situation.

If you cannot get a review when two medical reports are completely at odds with each other when can you get one? The word 'independent' is wrong as all decisions taken are 'in house' and are not transparent. My advice to anyone contemplating trying to get an independent review is don't unless you are prepared for many brick walls to be put in front of you and a long hard struggle.

Surely the Government wants an N.H.S. procedure that has the confidence of the public—not one that in certain circumstances leaves the bereaved feeling bitter and disillusioned? Please press our Health Ministers to look again into the situation surrounding my wife's death. We cannot bring her back but I don't want others to suffer as I have been made to."

My efforts have merely moved matters to the desk of the chairman of the NHS region and from there back to the new chairman of Berkshire health authority, but to no avail. Mr. Hook's last hope lies with the Minister, and I trust that she will rise to the challenge. I hope that she will use her powers to grant Mr. Hook his independent medical review and change the NHS complaints procedures to ensure that others are not forced to endure the same indignities that have been imposed so unfairly on my constitutent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) for bringing this case to my attention. I also preface my response by thanking him for his powerful and supportive words about the way in which his local health service has dealt with him in the past few weeks. I offer my sincerest condolences to Mr. Hook for his loss and appreciate that trying to pursue his complaint must have been traumatic for him. I have examined the case and I should make it clear from the outset that he has now exhausted the NHS complaints procedure.

My hon. Friend asked me to use my powers to compel Berkshire health authority to grant Mr. Hook an independent review panel to investigate his complaint further. At the same time, my hon. Friend, using powerful words such as "collusion" and "collapse", said that he wished that the complaints procedure were independent. It is independent in the sense that, as a Minister, I have no powers to order the authority to do anything. The mandatory framework for the NHS complaints procedure is set out in secondary legislation, so it has the force of law. Neither I nor my ministerial colleagues have any authority within that legal framework to instruct the NHS to deal with a particular case in a particular way. That is entirely right and proper.

It is clear from my hon. Friend's remarks that Mr. Hook, having been unable satisfactorily to resolve his concerns through the NHS procedure, approached the health service commissioner—commonly known as the ombusdman. Unfortunately, however, the commissioner could not investigate the substance of his complaint because it related to clinical decisions taken at a time when they were outside his jurisdiction. I can appreciate that this must have been very frustrating for Mr. Hook, but primary legislation, such as that governing the role of the ombudsman, is not generally made retrospective. Inevitably, some people will find themselves on the wrong side of the implementation line.

The ombudsman has some power to be flexible, but only if he has good reason. He will make the decision. He can look at how an NHS body has dealt with a complaint, even if the substance of the complaint is outside his jurisdiction. I do not know whether Mr. Hook has approached the ombudsman about the health authority's handling of his case, but if he has not, he may wish to consider doing so. I remind my hon. Friend, however, that the ombudsman is not obliged to take up every case that is submitted to him, even when it is within his remit. The ombudsman is entirely—and rightly—independent of both the NHS and Ministers.

I turn to the issues raised in the powerful letter, which my hon. Friend quoted, from Mr. Hook, in which he said that he would not want anyone else to suffer as he had. I want to say something about the Government's initiatives, the NHS complaints procedures and the project to which my hon. Friend referred. We must start by recognising that people who are ill are at their most vulnerable. They have a right to expect the NHS to provide them with the treatment that they need and that is appropriate to their condition. That applies whether they contact their GP or have to stay in hospital. The previous Government left the legacy of a two-tier complaints procedure, which we shall tackle shortly. When dealing with a service that relies heavily on human beings, errors will occur, as none of us is infallible. When mistakes occur, it is our challenge to examine the issues and put in place systems that try to minimise human errors to the lowest level possible. Patients and representatives need to express their dissatisfaction and concerns when mistakes are made.

The current complaints procedure was implemented in April 1996, following a major external review of the previous arrangements, which had generally been accepted as unsatisfactory. The new system—if it can still be called new after four years—has been to develop a mechanism that is basically the same, whichever part of the NHS a patient wants to complain about. It focuses on complaints being dealt with quickly but thoroughly at local level. A wholly new, more independent review of the complaint has been introduced for those cases that cannot be resolved by local action. A non-executive director of the NHS body concerned re-examines the complaint and reaches one of three decisions. I remind my hon. Friend that there is often a presumption that because the convenor is a non-executive director, he is part of the system, but non-executive directors are appointed by the Secretary of State. They are an independent part of a local structure and they are expected to act as such.

If the matter cannot be resolved locally, these non-executive directors may reach one of three decisions. They may decide that more can be done locally and advise accordingly. They may take the view that all that could reasonably be done to satisfy the complainant has been done and that no further action can be taken. Finally, they may decide that the issues can be resolved through a formal investigation by an independent review panel.

These changes represent a major sea change and are simply the beginning of a much wider process. The change that is most marked is in the primary care sector. In the past, GPs and family dentists were used to a system that was constrained by having to consider complaints only in terms of whether the standard terms of service had been breached. That was an adversarial, disciplinary approach that tended to leave both complainant and the individual complained about dissatisfied. Now they are expected to have effective practice-based procedures for dealing with complaints. Understandably, it has taken a while for some practitioners to get fully to grips with the new world.

When a system that brings about such significant changes as this one is put in place, it is inevitable that it is not welcomed across the board. Independent commentators have felt the system to be impartial, which is a good deal better than what we had before. We are aware of the criticisms, some of which have been very public—not least the recent report by the Select Committee on Health, when it inquired into procedures relating to adverse clinical incidents and the outcomes in medical care. We shall, of course, respond formally to the Health Committee.

I draw my hon. Friend's attention to an independent evaluation of the complaints procedure, which is under way. It is a major UK-wide study, it is about half way through its work, and it is looking at all aspects of the system. We need to examine the whole system; it is not piecemeal reform. The study has three key objectives: to highlight barriers to the effective operation of the procedure; to suggest ways of overcoming them; and to identify examples of good practice that can be shared with the NHS as a whole. Again, we want to ensure that good procedures are in place wherever a patient lives. The evaluation project's final report will be submitted to the Department of Health at the end of this year and we shall consider it carefully.

I was particularly encouraged this morning to read the parliamentary briefing issued by the NHS Confederation, which supports the evaluation project and our commitment to a complete and systematic examination of the procedures, rather than piecemeal tinkering at the edges. Such a conservative approach is exactly what we want.

My hon. Friend mentioned the research on the complaints procedures published by the Public Law Project last year. The study focused on the complainant's perspective, whereas one of the key features of our evaluation project is that it will be informed by the experiences of a whole range of people involved in the operation of the procedures. It is worth mentioning, too, that despite the clear statement of consumer focus, the PLP study interviewed only 36 complainants during the two years of its work. Our evaluation will involve literally hundreds of interviews. We welcome anything that will contribute to an informed debate on the issues.

Mr. Salter: Will the Minister deal with one matter that I raised and say whether the current evaluation, which is welcome, will cover time limits for complaints to be received? If not, will she ensure that it does? My hon. Friend said that Ministers have little power to intervene in complaints. Is she saying on the record that no Health Minister has ever intervened and that Ministers have neither the ability nor the power at least to express a view to the chairman of the health authority?

Ms Stuart: I remind my hon. Friend that discretion is already available to investigators. Strict time limits are set for medical negligence cases, but discretion to deal with complaints about procedures is exercised by the ombudsman.

[Ms Stuart]

As to impartiality, we must recognise that, when Government Departments set up independent structures to investigate procedures, Ministers have the responsibility to satisfy themselves that the structures are formed in such a way that they can respond. However, once the process is started in a particular case, it is impossible for procedures not to be properly followed. In this case, the procedures were followed. However, I would like to take it further.

I do not want anyone to be under the impression that we are not deeply committed to improving the system. It is not perfect. It needs improving, hence the PLP evaluation. Despite our feelings that 36 complaints may be a small base, I put it on record that the team is evaluating the report and there have been continued contacts with the complainants.

In the limited time available, I want to be sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the work that goes into reducing the incidence of complaints arising from the practices of general practitioners or doctors working in hospitals. It is important not to focus only on how to deal with mistakes; we try also to ensure that the number of mistakes is reduced. The NHS should function in a way that keeps mistakes to an absolute minimum, and all parts of the NHS should work to the same standards. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the national service frameworks will help the NHS to achieve that. Clinical governance, underpinned by a statutory duty of quality, will provide the NHS with the mechanisms for translating national standards into high-quality local services. However, neither NICE nor the Commission for Health Improvement can provide a quick fix.

I want to focus on our work in relation to general practitioners and doctors. To meet the high standards that we expect from general practitioners and doctors, we must ensure that those few who do not work hard and with total commitment—I stress that the vast majority do—are dealt with fairly quickly. Last November, the chief medical officer published the consultation document that began the process, entitled "Supporting Doctors, Protecting Patients". The second part of the title is the most important. The document sets out a new approach to how the NHS and the medical profession deal with poor professional performance.

The document makes proposals in five key areas. First, it suggests better prevention and earlier recognition of poor clinical performance. Secondly, it would require fast and effective action to evaluate emerging poor individual performances by referring them to an assessment and support centre that will advise on appropriate action. Thirdly, it suggests a consistent approach across all grades and types of doctor, including those in primary care. Fourthly, it suggests a closer working partnership between the NHS, the General Medical Council, the royal colleges and other professional bodies. Last, and by no means least, it would require strong patient participation in the new mechanisms. Taken together, those proposals will create mechanisms that will allow problems to be identified quickly, before patients are put at risk, yet provide the necessary help and support for the clinician.

Separate from those proposals, but parallel with them, the General Medical Council has plans to introduce revalidation, to ensure that the continued inclusion of a doctor's name on the medical register represents an assurance that the doctor has kept up to date in his chosen field and remains fit to practice.

I am only too aware that my remarks will have been of little comfort to my hon. Friend's constituent. I acknowledge that. However, it would have been wrong to offer Mr. Hook false hopes, when the fact is that few options are left to him to enable him to pursue his complaint further. Nevertheless, I would not want him to think that his efforts—and those of my hon. Friend, who has spoken on his behalf—have been in vain. The south-east regional office of the NHS executive will be working with the health authority to ensure that the lessons from this distressing case are learned. And there are lessons to be learned. Equally, it is vital that we get to hear about cases like Mr. Hook's.

Mr. Salter: If, as the Minister said, procedures had been properly followed in this case, will she please explain why there are lessons to be learned?

Ms Stuart: Even though procedures have been followed, it does not mean that their implementation cannot be improved or that we should not consider changing the procedures or the framework.

It would be wrong of me to offer hope or to promise something that cannot be delivered, but it is important that cases like Mr. Hook's are brought before such a forum as this, and that we should be able to revisit them. We should not consider only forward-looking complaints procedures, although we recognise that they are not satisfactory. We should look back and revisit the procedures that have been followed.

I assure my hon. Friend that we will give careful consideration to the matters that he has raised today. I would not want him to go away feeling that his time had been wasted. It was a valuable debate, and I am grateful to him and his constituents for being here today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Two o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Betts.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): It gives me great pleasure to open the debate on the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee's fourth report of the 1997–98 Session, which was agreed in November 1998. It deals with the Northern Ireland Prison Service, and is the first of the Committee's reports to be debated in this new Chamber.

I am aware that the House of Commons has had a very full meal of Northern Ireland affairs in the course of this week's business. Having been an undergraduate during the Suez crisis, I am conscious of the sense of anticlimax that can arise when pressure eases. In that respect, we have been unlucky in the timing of the debate. I hope that no one who is observing the Westminster Hall experiment will read too much into our comparative exhaustion following our exertions earlier in the week. I appreciate, of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you were very much a participant in those exertions.

Westminster Hall sittings are a modernisation experiment. On a personal level, I remark in passing that, given my representation of the City of London, the debate on Report of the Financial Services and Markets Bill in the House shows the conflict that this new initiative can create between constituency and other responsibilities.

The evidence on which the report is based was taken between April and July 1998, and the Committee reported to the House in November of that year. As the inquiry progressed, it became clear that the Northern Ireland Prison Service would be subject to substantial change, and that the implementation of the Belfast agreement would clearly enhance the scale of those changes. A vital part of our discussions centred on the service's ability to respond. In order to bring the House up to date with developments in the year since our report, the Committee held an evidence session on 27 October 1999, at which it examined the Director General of the Northern Ireland Prison Service and senior colleagues. That evidence is presented to hon. Members today.

I should like to pay particular tribute to our Clerk, Dr. Christopher Ward, who overcame with aplomb the task of seeing our report through its final stages, although having joined us only after we had taken the evidence. I also draw attention to paragraph 9 of the report, in which we pay tribute to our outstanding and authoritative advisers, Professor Tony Bottoms of Cambridge university and Dr. Andrew Coyle of King's college, London.

It is right that I should pay tribute, as did the Committee in its report, to the courage and professionalism over the past 30 years, in difficult and dangerous circumstances, of the Northern Ireland Prison Service. Some 29 members of the staff were killed, and many more injured, in the troubles. The service faced formidable challenges, to which it was fully equal.

Our visit to the Maze prison gave us first-hand knowledge of the considerable psychological pressures placed on the staff by inmates. Sir David Ramsbotham's report on conditions in the Maze prison, which was published as the Committee agreed its report, graphically describes those pressures. However, although the Maze prison garnered the headlines, other prisons—notably Maghaberry, the only other high security prison in Northern Ireland—posed difficulties, and continue to do so.

Now that the management of terrorist prisoners is ceasing to dominate the agenda—although it has not disappeared from it—the service is facing equally difficult challenges of a different nature. We identified several challenges at the time of our inquiry. There was substantial overstaffing in comparison with prison services in other parts of the United Kingdom, partly as a consequence of 10-fold expansion during the 1970s in reaction to the onset of terrorist violence. The overall prison estate is small; there are just four establishments, and one is a young offenders centre. That means that, apart from the Maze, there is only a single high security prison—at Maghaberry. That same site also houses Northern Ireland's only female prison.

We identified the problem of managing terrorist prisoners, particularly in the Maze prison, which houses the majority of adult male paramilitary prisoners. The implementation of the conclusions of the Prison Service review, which reported in September 1997, was expected to lead to substantial cost savings in the medium and long term. Target costs for prisoner places in Northern Ireland are three times higher than in England and Wales.

We identified as a challenge the management of the down-sizing of the service, as terrorist prisoners are progressively released under the provisions of the Belfast agreement, and the consequent restructuring of its operations. We recognised the need to reflect more accurately the balance of the community. At the time of our report, just 6.9 per cent. of those in uniformed and governor grades were Roman Catholic, as against 77.6 per cent. Protestant. While recognising the difficulties of redressing the balance at a time of substantial staff reductions, the Committee considered that a plan to do so should be a priority high on management's agenda.

Our inquiry identified the challenges of improving morale, tackling high levels of staff absence and improving the calibre of the management of the service. The Committee noted that Northern Ireland Prison Service managers had apparently not been able to provide a suitably qualified candidate for the post of director general, or for the key post of governor of the Maze prison. There was also an urgent need to improve training.

The Committee also commented on a number of other areas. They included the practice of integrating sex offenders and other vulnerable prisoners—in contrast to that in England and Wales—which the Committee considered might compromise their quality of life and possibly their safety. We considered the incarceration of a female child in Maghaberry prison—there being no secure unit for females elsewhere—to be outside the spirit of the modern treatment of juveniles, and wanted the situation to be remedied at the earliest opportunity. We also sought changes in accountability, particularly as the service is expected to return to a more conventional role as the emphasis moves away from handling terrorist prisoners. Specifically, the Committee called for jurisdiction over matters of prison discipline to cease to be a responsibility of boards of visitors, for the inspection of the Northern Ireland Prison Service to become a formal responsibility of one of Her Majesty's chief inspectors of prisons and for the establishment of a prison ombudsman for Northern Ireland. Finally, we sought improved links between the Northern Ireland Prison Service and the Northern Ireland probation service.

How did the Goverment respond to the report? In a brief reply sent to the Committee in February 1999 and published in the Committe's first special report last Session, the then Secretary of State announced that the Government "broadly endorsed" the Committee's 20 principal conclusions and recommendations. Only one recommendation was singled out for specific implementation—that relating to the removal of the board of visitors' role in adjudications which, the Secretary of State said,

"will be implemented, as soon as possible, by amendment to the Prison Rules".

I shall return to that recommendation later.

What progress did the October 1999 evidence session reveal in the eight months following the Government's response? I do not propose to go through the evidence in detail, but I shall single out a number of important points.

The closure of the Maze prison is expected in July 2000, assuming that the prisoner release programme continues on schedule. Under the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998, all but 12 or 13 of the Maze prisoners will be released by then. Indeed, as at 27 October, only 34 per cent. of the total number of prisoners before the commencement of early releases remained—about a third.

However, the reduction in inmates has not been matched by reductions in staffing or accommodation. Five of the eight blocks remain in use and staffing at the prison has fallen by only around a quarter from 1,200 to 900. The director general conceded that the 158 prisoners could be accommodated in two blocks but for the need to keep the various factions separated. The fact remains that, although there may be sound arguments for not disturbing the status quo, the staff-to-prisoner ratio at the Maze prison has risen markedly over the period of the early release scheme, and now stands at 6:1. The director general was aware of no other prison regime with such a remarkably high ratio.

It is clear that the pace of implementation of the Prison Service review has been reduced and that greater emphasis is being placed instead on the staff reduction programme as a means of bringing about cultural change. Under the latter programme which was designed to produce an overall staff reduction of around 1,100—approximately 40 per cent. of the service—by March 2001, one third of the target has so far been met through a combination of selective voluntary early retirement and severance schemes, normal age retirement, and so on. The following phase is an open voluntary early retirement and severance scheme, and it opened in November 1999. I hope that the Minister will tell us how that is progressing, the initial signs of likely take-up, and his assessment of the prospects for achieving all the required redundancies through voluntary means.

The evidence session on 27 October last year revealed a welcome increase in training and good progress in reducing the adverse impact of court escort duties on prison regimes. The Committee also noted the progress on handling vulnerable prisoners at Maghaberry and the effort being put into developing anti-bullying strategies. There has been a drop in absenteeism, but much progress remains to be made in that area, as the service recognises. In particular, the director general hopes that normalisation in the Province will greatly reduce the stress-related element of absenteeism.

One of the biggest challenges facing the service following the closure of the Maze will undoubtedly be the running of Maghaberry, which will then be the sole high security prison in Northern Ireland. In his evidence, the director general described it as "a very, very difficult prison."

It was not designed for its present use and there is what the director general described as "a fundamental staffing issue" in the relationship between the staff's attendance arrangements and the work that must be done, on which negotiations are in progress with the Prison Officers Association. I hope that the Minister can give us a progress report on those.

Maghaberry will, presumably, also have to accommodate the rump of prisoners from the Maze when that prison closes. Although Maghaberry already houses paramilitary prisoners—transfer to the Maze prison has always been voluntary—it remains to be seen whether its integrated regime will be able to accommodate prisoners who are used to a segregated one.

Maghaberry prison is, in many respects, the cornerstone of the Northern Ireland prison system. It will continue to play a crucial role. There has been a series of disturbing press reports over the past few months about conditions there, and several worrying incidents, such as the recent discovery of an imitation firearm and the apparent use of home-made incendiary devices. There is also an unusually high number of fires in the prison, which are alleged to be resulting in a high level of compensation claims from prisoners. The Minister may wish to say something about those points when he replies to the debate.

The evidence session revealed that there was unlikely to be any material change, at least in the short term, in the religious imbalance in the service. That is unfortunate. With the implementation of the Patten proposals on the police in Northern Ireland, the Prison Service will look increasingly anomalous. Although I recognise the difficulties of recruiting into a service that is being downsized at the rate which the Prison Service plans, given the lack of recruitment in recent years, some means needs to be found of reducing the religious imbalance and of introducing new blood generally.

One surprise to come from the evidence session was that our recommendation on ending the role of the board of visitors in adjudications, to which I alluded earlier, had not been implemented, despite the Secretary of State's response. Although the director general explained the reasons, it is a fact that that change of policy would not have come to the Committee's attention but for the evidence session. I suggest to the Minister, and to the Government at large, that it would be conducive to good relations between Select Committees and the Executive if Ministers were to take the initiative and inform the Committee as soon as possible when a change of policy impacts on the Government's position on a Committee recommendation.

Whatever I may say about the timing of the debate this week, in other respects its timing is especially apposite, because last month the Secretary of State announced the start of the quinquennial review of the status of the Northern Ireland Prison Service as an agency of the Executive. I hope that those responsible for the review will look closely at the Committee's report and evidence, and will read carefully the report of today's debate. The Northern Ireland Prison Service has given sterling service to the Province. Despite the morale-sapping difficulties that it has faced, its devotion to duty and its security record have been excellent. Whatever further changes the review brings, I have every confidence that the Prison Service will continue to serve the people of Northern Ireland well in the future. I commend the report to the House.

2.45 pm

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): During the troubles, 29 members of the Northern Ireland Prison Service were killed. Even during the recent period of relative peace, prison officers have been attacked in their homes. In the period 1996–97, there were 122 reported threats against staff, and 50 officers were admitted to the special protection scheme. People make a courageous choice when they choose to work in the Prison Service. In that context, I shall speak briefly on the general pressures facing the service as well as the specific problems, and on what I hope to see as a result of the report.

As the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) rightly said, there are huge psychological pressures on prison staff. Personal information on staff members is regularly gathered by the paramilitaries, and has been used to powerful effect by prisoners who remain in close contact with active paramilitary units outside jail. Casual references by prisoners to officers' personal lives induce a sense of menace that is played on by many prisoners. The normal balance of control in a prison can be reversed by prisoners willing to influence staff in that way.

The political climate in Northern Ireland has had a tremendous impact on the way in which the Prison Service there is run. About 500 prisoners are segregated according to political affiliation into five separate housing units. The murder of Billy Wright demonstrates that many prisoners are violently opposed to each other, and are occasionally in a position to do something about it. Once in prison, they are confined to the wing in which fellow members of their organisation are housed. Each wing has its own commanding officer, appointed by the paramilitary organisation to maintain discipline among the ranks of the imprisoned members.

If one steps back to consider that, one sees that it is an extraordinary way to run a prison service. We could analyse the history of how we got to that predicament, which highlights the difficulty involved in moving from the past to the futre. The future Prison Service should be much more in line with mainstream prison systems in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Attempts to treat prisoners as individuals in the Maze have largely been foiled as the prisoners regard themselves as prisoners of war. That has created a different ethos with regard to prisoners' behaviour. They enjoy the support of significant sections of the community, which places prison officers under immense pressure when trying to maintain order. In 1994, the management decided to withdraw staff from patrolling duties in the residential areas of the wings because officers were effectively hostages, unable to enforce orders against the will of organised prisoner groups.

We must bear in mind those general pressures when we consider reform. I shall move on to some specific problems. I shall not repeat the points already made. Low staff morale is a key issue to be faced. The high number of sick days taken is a testimony to the burden of the job. Furthermore, when staff take sick leave, it places more of a burden on those who remain at work.

Job insecurity may also have contributed to the problem. The Good Friday agreement does not make it clear how many staff will be needed or where they will be based, which is probably having a negative effect on morale as well. There is also an imbalance in the composition of staff. Approximately 6.9 per cent. are Roman Catholic, 77.6 per cent. are Protestant and 15.5 per cent. are not categorised. That causes problems that are clear for all to see. Nor is the training programme fully effective. The target of five days per staff member has not been fulfilled: the average is in fact three days.

We have touched on sectarian problems associated with prisoners, but there is also a distribution problem. Although one would normally expect remand prisoners to be detained separately from convicted prisoners, women to be detained separately from men, and juveniles to be detained separately from adults, that is not always possible in Northern Ireland because of the small number of establishments. For example, sex offenders are not separated from other prisoners, and concerns have arisen about bullying and serious ill-treatment. In England and Wales, there are vulnerable prisoner units for sex offenders, although such offenders can be integrated with other prisoners if they wish. In Northern Ireland, the reverse applies. As was said, young female offenders are currently held at Maghaberry in a special centre, but I am concerned that it is not really sufficient.

[Mr. Lembit Öpik]

I referred to the issue of future uncertainty. On 11 November 1998, the Director General of the Prison Service said that the full implementation of the Good Friday agreement could make possible the closure of the Maze prison, to which reference has been made, by the end of 2000. Such uncertainty is giving rise to some specific problems.

Liberal Democrats broadly support the report's recommendations and welcome what the Government have already said, but we have some questions. How will paramilitary prisoners be dealt with after the Good Friday agreement is fully implemented? Has the effect of the Good Friday agreement on the Prison Service and staffing levels become any clearer? Can a timetable be established in respect of changes in numbers? From where will staff be drawn? A specific retraining programme would make a lot of sense, and I agree with what the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster said about providing generous redundancy packages. Similar comments have been made in the past in respect of the police service.

What can we do to raise morale? The changing political circumstances will no doubt help, but the endemic difficulties to which I have referred require specific attention. Should more placement officers from outside Northern Ireland be used in the Northern Ireland Prison Service? There are pros and cons, but it may be a way in which to depersonalise the work by making it more difficult for specific prison officers to be intimidated and influenced. However, political changes may in any case reduce such pressures.

What can be done to ensure that a system of vulnerable prisoner units exists in Northern Ireland? There is a duty of care, and adequate protection from attacks should be provided. I am not suggesting that sex offenders should necessarily be kept completely separate from other prisoners, but we need a clearer strategy. Various tactical decisions have led us to the current position. That is understandable, but perhaps we can take a step forward through this review.

Keeping young offenders in close proximity to adult offenders is probably unwise. Again, we need a clear strategy to ensure that young offenders are treated separately and do not interact with adult prisoners.

The same goes for young female offenders. Could they be held at Hydebank, for example, in separate quarters from the males?

I want to comment on two other issues. One relates to the Maze and the specific procedures for its closure. If normalisation continues, it would be more appropriate to ensure that ordinary criminals are held properly. At the same time, we should begin to address the odd ethos that I have described with regard to the paramilitary organisations.

The second matter is that I hope that all these reforms will be undertaken in the context of full implementation of the Good Friday agreement and the presumed stabilisation of the security situation. I would be encouraged to know that the strategy was a long-term one, perhaps making some assumptions on the way, but assumptions in the context of other pressures and issues relating to the Good Friday agreement.

There seems to be a prospect of a return to a more conventional role for the Prison Service, and it is appropriate that modern systems of accountability should be established. I hope that we shall have assurances from the Minister on that. I must apologise in advance to him for not being able to stay to the end of the debate, for reasons that I cannot change, but I shall read his comments and I hope that he will forgive me for my rudeness in leaving.

I simply emphasise that whatever we do must be in the context of thinking about the long-term normalisation of Northern Ireland and with due consideration for the prison staff, who have unquestionably suffered some ugly treatment in the past.

2.56 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): In rising to commend the report, I emphasise particularly the contribution that it has made, and is making, to the process of normalisation to which the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) referred. The theme of the report is to move from an extraordinary and aberrant Prison Service to one that functions as it does in the rest of the United Kingdom. In many ways, the report ensconces that idea. For example, paragraph 29 refers to bringing the prisons within the remit of the chief inspector. That is an amazing thing to have to say: for the most part, prisons are within the inspectorate and one would not expect a report to have to make that recommendation. However, in order to talk about normalisation, it was right that we should try to identify how extraordinarily abnormal the Northern Ireland Prison Service was. We hope that, as it changes, the past tense will become an ever more accurate way of describing the changes that are taking place.

That extraordinary or abnormal nature comes out in so many ways. The Maze prison is the most appalling place that I have ever visited. I have visited many prisons, in the United Kingdom and abroad, and I have not seen another prison whose landscape was like a moonscape because there was no gardening. There could be no gardening at the Maze because anyone who went out to garden was likely to get killed. That kind of prison regime, under which people had to be confined in concrete quarters, meant that the impression of absolute desolation was very forceful. Yet every person in that appalling place had chosen to go there rather than to Maghaberry, which is a much more conventional and pleasant-looking place, where there are workshops and the normal processes of prisoner education that is rightly obtained in the rest of our prison system. Why would anyone choose to go from Maghaberry, a place which looks as if the inmates have a role to play in shaping it, learning and mixing with other people—awful though all prisons are—to a place like the Maze? The answer was that a substantial number of prisoners in Northern Ireland regarded themselves as freedom fighters. That strong definition, whether on the loyalist or the republican side, was so deeply etched into the system that it was impossible for the prison to be controlled without accommodating it, but the authorities were never explicit about it.

The report talks about the psychological condition of prison officers in Northern Ireland. In my view, it was one of considerable distress, from so many angles. At Hydebank, the young offenders prison, people were being locked up incredibly early in the evening and suffered all sorts of deprivations on top of those that are normally obtained in our prison system. Why was that? The answer, in short, was because of the Prison Officers Association's bolshy view. It was almost as if, where prison officers could exert some control, they would do so dogmatically, because there was one place where they exerted very little control.

That abnormality in the system made it difficult to imagine how one could address the psychological distress of prison officers. The prison officers at the Maze could not have any sensible interaction with the prison population, because it was so different from the prison populations in the rest of the country. When one visits a prison in Cambridge or on Dartmoor, one meets people who are outside society. Many of them come out of prison to broken marriages, homelessness or the streets of London. When I discussed a particularly difficult prisoner at the Maze with one of the paramilitary commanding officers, as they called themselves, he said, "He'll be all right." I said, "How can you say he'll be all right?" as the prisoner was not long due to be released. The self-denominated commanding officer said, "We'll find him a suitable job." In other words, the person inside the prison was organising the employment of his fellow inmates.

One might think that that is normal, but it is not normal in any meaningful sense. Prisoners do not normally have the capacity to find jobs for other prisoners. That sense of power—that people outside could be required to find prisoners a job, and would find them a job if a word was merely said—was conveyed throughout the system and applied also to other more ominous utterances. If the commanding officer said to a prison officer, "Nice young daughter you've got", the prison officer would not sleep that night, if the remark was made in the context that the prison officer was regarded as having crossed the inmate.

That is not normal, but the effort to move from that to normality required the Government to take the extraordinary steps that they have taken, with the agreement of the vast majority of the people of Northern Ireland, in seeking not simply a different kind of prison system, but a different concordat governing society that then made possible the transition from an extraordinary, abnormal prison service to a normal one.

The Select Committee was grateful that the Government took the recommendations so seriously. I am grateful to my Committee colleagues of all parties, who worked so hard to address the issue. It is not easy for any of us to admit to such a substantial failure in a society of which we are, for the most part, justly proud. When considering the threats and the power of prisoners, we have had to consider the major malfunctions that occurred—I hope that that is in the past tense—in Northern Ireland's society. There is a long way to go, but, although the report is critical, particularly in paragraph 74, of the prison officers, none of us could have done better in the circumstances in which they were placed. They were given an impossible job and many did it with great courage and as much humanity and intelligence as were possible in circumstances that society had made impossible for them.

In commending the report, I hope that the House will note that many of the suggestions are work-in-progress towards normalisation. I hope that issues such as vulnerable prisoner units and more effective treatments and responses to young offenders will be processed. I hope that the Minister will provide the assurance that we want that the process of normalisation will continue apace and that the Prison Service that remains after normalisation will be properly integrated into the United Kingdom prison system.

3.7 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Inevitably, contributions by members of the Select Committee will be selective and personal. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) because I agree profoundly with most of what he said. He referred to "a substantial failure" and I regret to report that, with qualifications, to which I shall refer, that is a valid overall judgment on the situation that we found during our inquiry.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) referred to the courage and professionalism of the Prison Service. I am sure that there is no dissent about the courage, but we must be cautious in what we say about the professionalism. Some of my conclusions during our inquiry—it was reinforced by having spoken to and met many serving Prison Service officers over the years—are that the professionalism is latent, the intention exists, the wish to provide a highly professional service exists, but a combination of circumstances has failed to enable the delivery of that good intention of professionalism. I shall present a brief thesis to illustrate that.

I shall deal first with the paragraphs headed "Management" and then look more closely at the issue of low morale and lack of professional pride in the Prison Service.

Management is the greatest deficiency in the Northern Ireland Prison Service, and we must begin to focus our attention on that. A continuing theme throughout our inquiry was the question mark over the quality of the service's management. Before we began our deliberations, we inherited Mr. Narey's report, in which he described his doubts about the quality of management. He returned to that theme in his oral evidence to the Committee. The prime illustration of the problem, which was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster, was that the management of the Northern Ireland Prison Service was of insufficient quality to provide a governor of the Maze and a director general of the service.

Her Majesty's inspector of prisons also commented on the need to improve the quality of the Northern Ireland Prison Service's management. We heard powerful evidence to the same effect from the Prison Governors Association and the Prison Officers Association. One of the most alarming features of the evidence received from that quarter was that of the lack of trust and communication between the sectors in the service.

That is why, although I fully endorse and support summary (d), I found it to be a depressing conclusion to have to give. It says:

"There is considerable cause for concern about the ability of the managers in the Service to cope with the demands on the system which likely reforms and changes will require".

[Mr. Andrew Hunter]

I hope that when the Minister responds to the debate, he will assure us that positive steps are being taken to address the quality of management in the Prison Service.

The second point that I wish to make is that without that improved quality of management, the tragedy of today's Prison Service—low morale and the lack of professional pride—cannot be addressed effectively. In paragraph 39 of the report, we state:

"We were unfavourably impressed with the low morale displayed by staff".

That is our abiding recollection of the inquiry. We were preceded by Narey, who, in paragraph 1.21 of his report, described a "general air of apathy which pervades much of the establishment".

Members of the Prison Officers Association and the Prison Governors Association, from whom we took evidence, spoke of a deep sense of unhappiness among staff. As those of us who have read Sir David Ramsbotham's report know, he found many such instances among the Maze prison staff.

One of the manifestations of that low morale is the abnormally high sickness rate, which is partly a symptom of the acute personnel problems that afflict the service. That factor compounds itself, because absence for sickness increases the burden on, and overstretches, other members of the Prison Service. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) referred to the failure to reduce that problem, which was a key target of the latest report.

The Committe found in its inquiry that the first step in addressing the high rate of staff absenteeism is to examine its causes very closely. A degree of communication between management and prison staff is required that has so far been lacking. I acknowledge that management have expressed their written good intentions, but they have not been put into practice. The reality is that it is the responsibility of the highest level of management to deal with staff absenteeism in partnership with relevant staff associations and local management. We are talking about a breakdown in basic management techniques and communication. The matter is urgent and should be given the highest priority.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that management's perceived make-do-and-mend attempts to come up with a short-term solution contributed greatly to unsatisfactory relationships between management and prison officers? Does he also agree that proper long-term planning was needed, and that the lack of progression in the officer corps through training and expertise to senior management level has reflected badly on management over the years?

Mr. Hunter: The hon. Gentleman is right, as his wide experience in these matters will confirm. Indeed, the Committee received considerable evidence to that effect. The evidence suggested that a full-blown scheme of exchange of placements might help to infuse a wider perspective in the horizons of management and Prison Service officers. I am sure that that is right, but a long look should be taken at establishing a structure and appropriate training that will provide incentives and a clear career path. That is the way to improve quality at every level of the Prison Service.

My last point is at a slight tangent, but I plead justification because it has already been raised in passing by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, who spoke for the Liberal Democrats. In the Government's response to our report, the Secretary of State acknowledged that the Prison Service should hold prisoners in "secure and humane confinement". I could not read those words without recalling the events of 26 December 1997, when Billy Wright was murdered in the Maze prison. I acknowledge that that was an isolated incident, but it was surely the most dreadful indictment imaginable of the proposition that the Prison Service is providing secure confinement.

The Minister and I have corresponded about this matter over the months and years, but fears have not been put to rest that it is being covered up behind a smokescreen. The most thorough public inquiry is needed to examine and establish how, in the most secure prison in the United Kingdom—perhaps even in western Europe—a prisoner could be murdered—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall suspend the sitting for 15 minutes.

3.19 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.34 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Hunter: I had almost completed my remarks, and I shall now do so briefly.

I was making the point that I was profoundly concerned to read in the Secretary of State's response to the Committee the reference to the aim of the Prison Service to hold prisoners in "secure and humane confinement". In that context, I was referring to the murder of Billy Wright on 26 December 1997. It was dreadful that such an event could take place in what is regarded as one of the most secure prisons, at least in western Europe. I used the words "smokescreen" and "cover-up", because that is the perception of a significant number of people.

I shall make my final point on the subject of Mr. Wright's murder.

Mr. Beggs: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the callous and brutal murder of the prisoner David Keys, not long after that, was equally horrific and that it reflected badly on, and contributed to the loss of morale of, the prison officers charged with providing secure conditions for that prisoner?

Mr. Hunter: I accept that correction from the hon. Gentleman, and I agree that I should have included that case in my comments. It was the other side of an unacceptable coin. Essentially, the same situation arose, involving the objective of the Prison Service to provide secure confinement, although security did not apply to those who were confined.

I come to my final point on that event of 26 December 1997, and the murder that followed soon after. Do not those events—at least in the case of Mr. Wright—suggest either a dereliction and abandonment of duty arguably second to none, or even, as some fear, tacit consent, if not active contrivance? Those questions will remain unanswered unless or until the Government instigate a full public inquiry into the events.

3.37 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The report was issued reasonably recently, yet the developments taking place in Northern Ireland involve such rapid change that almost anything that one says is soon past the point. We are dependent on the Minister to bring us up to date. We have conducted a thorough investigation, with a report published in November 1998, and which started in the previous April; we have revisited the issue since. Nevertheless, changes are taking place of such a dramatic nature that almost anything one says at any stage will be slightly out of date. It is, therefore, difficult to develop a full and proper blueprint.

We have the report dated November 1998, and the Government's quite short response dated March 1999. We then had a session at which people from the Northern Ireland Prison Service returned to us in Committee, and we attempted to find out what had developed since that stage. That matter is also now in front of us. [Interruption.] My apologies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accepted.

Mr. Barnes: If I may have a second to attend to my pager, I shall ensure that that does not happen again.

Therefore, it is a rapidly changing scene, which revolves around the Belfast agreement and all the hopes that are pinned on it. The agreement dramatically changes many things in Northern Ireland and has already had a major impact on the Prison Service. A number of people have already been released from the Maze, and equivalent prisoners will in future go to Maghaberry. Therefore, a more normal prison procedure should now obtain and we should not expect to adhere in future to the pattern that my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) described. However, almost no one has an exact blueprint for the future; there is no clear Utopian guide. There are some ideas and suggestions, which I hope are the result of the Select Committee doing its work thoroughly, but neither we nor the Northern Ireland Office, and certainly not the Northern Ireland Prison Service, has yet found the means to resolve the complex problems that we face.

We find an example of the way in which things move in the memorandum submitted to the Select Committee by the Northern Ireland Prison Service. It said that the report produced by Sir David Ramsbotham, Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons,

"contained 143 recommendations and many helpful and pragmatic pointers for the way forward. However its publication came at a time when the position at Maze was significantly different than at the time of the inspection."

Therefore, things are already beginning to change dramatically.

To some extent that affects the position of the Northern Ireland Prison Service. It has received massive criticism. The Select Committee report was critical of it, and the Prison Officers Association was highly critical of the management. Although changes have taken place in the management, we have had to prod it to produce proposals, but the proposals before us are still not as precise as they should be. In some of the evidence that was presented to us, the Northern Ireland Prison Service was trying to make assessments for the month to come and developments were just around the corner.

The main problem for the Prison Service is the impact of the troubles—the existence of the Maze and the fact that 29 prison officers have been killed. That has led to low morale and low commitment and a high rate of absences, which affect not only the day-to-day working of the Prison Service but its training programmes, because people are missing from training programmes, too. In spite of comparative overstaffing, which has been created by problems in the past and aggravated by the recent release of prisoners, a depressing situation exists. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead described it very well. He said that if a prisoner in the Maze says to a prison officer, "How's your daughter doing?" or asks about something else in his personal life, that will restrain the officer's responses and disturb him considerably.

I had some experience of that when I was in the Maze. My group went to see different groups of paramilitary prisoners. When we visited the IRA section, we talked to the second team for a while, until the first team arrived. When the self-appointed commander and his deputy arrived, it took them a while to work out who we were. After a while, the deputy said, "Ah, you're Harry Barnes." The chill that went down my spine was substantial, he will be pleased to hear. It is easy to understand the response of those who work there daily. I shall not mention the name of the person concerned, but I noticed his release from prison the other day. I am well established and well protected in these hallowed halls, but I am aware that a tremendous impact must be made on those involved in day-to-day operations. There will be knock-on consequences in Maghaberry and elsewhere.

Mr. Beggs: Just to ensure that the hon. Gentleman does not forget his experience, may I ask whether he is comforted by the thought that that individual may soon receive a pass allowing him freedom of access to the Palace of Westminster?

Mr. Barnes: I shall consider that possibility with great interest and try to respond in like kind when I see him in the Corridors of Westminster.

The great problem in the Prison Service, over and above low morale and absenteeism, is overstaffing and the inevitable imbalance in the number of prison officers from the Catholic and Protestant communities. The Select Committee's report touched on that imbalance and the difficulty of tackling it, which is considerable. The Patten report referred to that and future operations.

The Prison Service has 6.9 per cent. Catholics and 77.6 per cent. Protestants, with a rapidly declining need for prison officers following the releases from the Maze and the resulting overstaffing there. The necessary downsizing is made more difficult by moves to correct the balance.

We considered services linked with the Prison Service—for example, cooks, kitchen porters and so on. With the number of applications for those jobs, it might be easier to ensure that there is some movement towards more Catholics being employed. Some attention has been paid to encouraging people to follow up advertisements for employment in those services.

The Prison Service can compliment itself on those numbers having risen recently, but people from the Catholic community who replied to the most recent advertisement for cooks, kitchen porters and so on constituted only 20 per cent. of applicants. That is still much lower than the percentage of Catholics in the general population and the jobs have been re-advertised to try to stimulate more interest.

There are massive problems. For example, there is the problem of the culture in the Prison Service. The attitude of some existing officers may make it uncomfortable for Catholics to apply. There is also a problem for Catholics in their own communities as a result of the feeling that they should not be prison officers. We know about the problems in the police service, which must be even greater in the Prison Service—especially a Prison Service with residual activities in relation to paramilitary provision. The constraints within Catholic communities are considerable. However, civilianisation may offer a hope for correcting the balance at an earlier stage.

In a more general sense, perhaps a number of prison officer jobs should be allocated to back-up provisions in a move towards civilianisation. Such a move, which clearly could take place in Northern Ireland, has already taken place throughout the United Kingdom police force. It may prove easier to attract applications for jobs that are not front-line positions.

Creating posts in the Prison Service so that people will apply for jobs is a considerable problem. The Government must give thought to the available resources and what needs to be done. With regard to the police force, it has been suggested that people should be encouraged to apply for jobs in police forces elsewhere to provide specialist assistance and advice. That approach will have consequences for the Prison Service.

Early retirement, financial provision, back-up assistance, and the relocation and retraining of people who must use their skills in a different setting are matters of great importance, and the financial implications are considerable. The Northern Ireland Office must confront the question of whether extra resources should be found to tackle those problems. If all goes well and powers are transferred to the Executive and the Assembly, the involvement of the Committee and the Northern Ireland Office will decline. However, we hope that that will not result in what has been described as the peace dividend, whereby a certain block of money is transferred and the remainder is not taken into account. Resources should be available to maintain the Northern Ireland police force and Prison Service, both of which are heavily manned.

This should not be seen as a great opportunity for the Exchequer to save money. Instead, we should recognise that those resources are needed as Northern Ireland moves from an exceptional set of circumstances to normality. However, that normality cannot simply be swtiched on; it must be nurtured.

The Prison Service management are now nudging towards many of the ideas on the direction in which matters should move that are given in the documents. I hope that we can lift our analysis by saying that the necessary resources will be provided, so that the proposals that have been made can be realised.

3.54 pm

Mr. Jeffrey Donaldson (Lagan Valley): As a member of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, I am conscious of the contributions made by my right hon. and hon. Friends to the report, which forms part of the remit of this afternoon's debate.

It is worth recalling the circumstances that gave rise to the Committee's decision to hold an inquiry into the efficiency and effectiveness of the Northern Ireland Prison Service. The escape of the IRA prisoner Liam Averill from the Maze prison on 10 December 1997 was closely followed, on 27 December, by the murder at the prison of the prisoner Billy Wright. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) reminded us, that was followed by the murder of the unsentenced prisoner David Keys in the Maze on 15 March 1998.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): I am following the hon. Gentleman's remarks closely, and I thought that I heard him say that there was an unsentenced prisoner—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman addresses the Chair; otherwise, the microphone will not pick up what he says and it will be difficult for me to hear him.

Mr. Taylor: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is the first time that I have spoken in this Chamber and it has a different orientation. Personally, I find it difficult to speak to someone with my back to him.

I understood the hon. Gentleman to say that murder or injury had been inflicted on an unsentenced prisoner in the Maze. I find it surprising that unsentenced prisoners should be held in such a grave prison, with its high-level security and the landscape that was described earlier. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there are remand prisoners in the Maze?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. It is true that remand prisoners are held alongside sentenced prisoners in the Maze prison. David Keys was a Loyalist Volunteer Force prisoner who was held in the LVF block at the Maze. He was on remand awaiting trial for his alleged involvement in two murders in the village of Poyntzpass. He was allegedly murdered by some fellow inmates belonging to the LVF. It was a sad case.

I say at the outset that I and my party condemn, absolutely and without reservation, the activities of all the terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland. However, that does not mean that we should not be concerned about what happens in our prisons and the welfare of prisoners, regardless of their crimes. Those of us in positions of legislative responsibility have a duty to ensure that their conditions are humane.

However, that duty must be balanced by the need to provide proper security in prisons. Concern about the conjunction of events in the Maze and their impact on security at the prison—and on the security of the wider community—prompted the Committee to hold its inquiry. Those events had a significant impact not only on the Prison Service, but on the wider political process at a crucial time.

The escape of Liam Averill, and in particular the murder of Billy Wright, had a destabilising influence that almost led to a complete breakdown of some of the ceasefires. Prison security is important not only for ensuring that prisoners stay in prison, but for the wider political process.

Mr. Hunter: To complete the hon. Gentleman's line, with some presumption, we are talking of some of the unsung heroes of the peace process.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I shall not add to his point.

Prisons and prisoners have been a very important aspect of the wider political process—to the extent, regrettably, that prisoners became a bargaining chip in the negotiations that led up to the Belfast agreement. An early release scheme was introduced, which provided for the early release of prisoners linked to terrorist organisations. I objected to that scheme in principle because I felt that it was wrong to trade prisoner releases for political concessions or political agreement on issues that were not relevant to the prison.

I still cannot understand why one of my constituents, who is serving a life sentence in Maghaberry prison for the murder of his wife, will serve that sentence while prisoners in the Maze who also committed murder have now been released. It is difficult to explain to my constituent why a politically motivated crime is treated differently from a crime with another motivation. That will set a difficult precedent in Northern Ireland if there is a resumption or a continuation of terrorist violence.

Mr. McWalter: The actions of many of those in the Maze prison were heinous, vile and murderous. The difficulty in any society that is experiencing a major malfunction is that, sometimes, some people within it believe that violence is justified in such circumstances to correct the social malfunction.

Whether or not the hon. Gentleman shares that view, he must recognise what one might call the Nelson Mandela objection. That involved someone whom most people would regard as a person of high principle and honour finding himself in a society in which he felt the need to put a bomb on a railway. That is the logic that most people understand. Even if we do not agree that the justification in place X is as worth while as the justification in place Y, nevertheless some people in place X think that it is, which will generate that kind of action. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the normalisation is important and must be cherished and allowed to progress.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. before I call the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson), may I say that the Chair does not like overlong interventions? I have been tolerant because of the tone of the debate, but such interventions are generally unhelpful.

Mr. Donaldson: Perhaps I am dealing with prisoner releases in isolation, but one difficulty for many people in Northern Ireland is that, while they see a significant concession made to a terrorist organisation, they do not see the reciprocity required if the political process is to move forward. I am not suggesting that prisoners are traded for anything, but if the exceptional circumstances described by the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) are relevant, it is time that those organisations that are benefiting from the prisoner release scheme started to deliver on their side, especially in terms of illegal weapons.

The early release scheme has had a major impact on the Prison Service and its complement is now being downsized through the staff reduction scheme. We may well soon see the closure of the Maze prison. The hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead may have been a little uncharitable when he described the prison as a moonscape. It is in my constituency and when I am there I travel past it almost daily. Its architectural design may not be pleasing to the eye, but one must understand that the function of a prison is not to be architecturally pleasing but to secure the incarceration of those placed there by the judicial system.

We are dealing with a particular set of individuals, who have chosen to associate together in terrorist organisations. Measures have therefore been taken—I hope that they will continue to be—to ensure that those prisoners are secured and that their escape is prevented. The Maze prison was often described as the most secure prison in Europe, yet there was a mass escape from it in the 1980s that sadly involved the murder of one prison officer. Subsequent escape attempts were made, and the IRA prisoner Liam Averill succeeded. That escape contributed to the circumstances that gave rise to the inquiry.

Although it may be desirable that prisoners should be able to participate in what might be called normal prison activities, I remind the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead that, for the IRA, gardening means digging a tunnel. I can understand why the Northern Ireland Prison Service might not wish to encourage that activity. The wider community in Northern Ireland thought that the prisoners in the Maze prison enjoyed a degree of what I might call "luxury".

Mr. Beggs: A holiday camp.

Mr. Donaldson: Indeed, it was often described as a holiday camp. Special arrangements were made for the prisoners to associate in paramilitary groupings and they enjoyed a large degree of freedom within prison confines—and a large degree of control over the prison's day-to-day affairs. We discovered that the officers commanding the various paramilitary factions had an arrangement with the prison governor—they negotiated arrangements for the management of the prison. I have no doubt that that special arrangement gave rise to the difficulties that led to the circumstances that I described earlier.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the prisoners out on Christmas parole enjoyed the Maze so much that he went back before his parole ended? The situation in the Maze goes back many years; I remember having to identify the body of a chief prison officer who had appeared on television to speak of the prison officers' problems in dealing with prisoners under the relaxed regime that politicians had imposed on them.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank my hon. Friend for reminding us that that problem has been going on for some time. As I said, prison matters can have an impact on the wider political process. I think of the hunger strikes in the early 1980s, over many of the issues that have been mentioned which had a serious impact on the political process in Northern Ireland.

I do not want to dwell too much on what has happened. The inquiry and the Committee's report are important because of the lessons that can be learned and how those lessons are applied to the present and the evolving situation in the Northern Ireland Prison Service. If the early release scheme continues and the Maze prison closes, Maghaberry prison will become the main establishment in the Northern Ireland Prison Service. As it happens, Maghaberry prison is also in my constituency; I have a large prison population in my constituency. Although not all the prisoners have their origins in my constituency, many of the prison staff who work in Maghaberry and the Maze live there.

I pay tribute to the staff of the Northern Ireland Prison Service who have, in the difficult circumstances mentioned by members of the Committee, sought to ensure adequate prison security, not only for the effective management of prisons but to protect the wider community. I urge the Government to bring forward their plans, which have apparently been delayed, for the award of a medal to Northern Ireland Prison Service staff to mark their contribution over the recent decades of violence—although I hope that they will not, unlike certain recent awards, be given posthumously. Such awards will recognise the past, present and future contribution of the service.

I am concerned about recent incidents of arson attacks and violence at Maghaberry prison. Elements within Maghaberry—paramilitaries are now there—may seek, through violence and pressure on prison staff, to have imported into the prison the regime that prevailed at the Maze. I urge the Minister and the Government to stand firm against any such move. As I have said, many of the incidents at the Maze, including the escape of Liam Averill and the murder of Billy Wright, were a direct consequence of the regime that was in operation—a regime that hindered effective management and security. It would therefore be a disaster if the regime at the Maze were transferred to Maghaberry. Control must be retained and the governor must be given the resources that he needs to deal with such problems.

One problem that we found on our visit to Maghaberry was staff morale and the alarming levels of staff absenteeism, particularly due to stress-related illnesses. A small amount of manpower in the Prison Service has been freed up by the early release scheme, and some staff have moved as part of the first two phases of the staff reduction scheme, but there is still an excess of staff, exacerbated by the recent closures of blocks in the Maze. If staff are needed at Maghaberry, I hope that the management of the Northern Ireland Prison Service will make officers available to nip problems in the bud so that matters do not become difficult to control. I hope that the management and staff at Maghaberry are given the support that they need to deal with that problem.

I want to add to what my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) said about the murder of Billy Wright in the Maze prison. As a Northern Ireland Member of Parliament, I am not holding a candle for Billy Wright, the Loyalist Volunteer Force, or any terrorist organisation. I have condemned the activities of all such organisations. However, I am deeply concerned about the circumstances surrounding the murder of Billy Wright in the Maze prison. I do not believe that the inquiries conducted either by Martin Narey or by Sir David Ramsbotham got to the core of the issues surrounding that murder. There is public interest in getting at the truth and in understanding the sequence of events that led to the murder. I shall not rehearse those today, but there was a series of so-called coincidences, which facilitated the actions of those who murdered Billy Wright. I accept that they have been apprehended, brought before the courts and sentenced, but that is not the end of the matter.

On Tuesday next week, I and others, acting in the public interest, will visit the Maze prison, together with Mr. David Wright, the victim's father. We shall look at the layout of the prison and discuss with prison management the circumstances leading to the murder. I echo the call of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke for an independent public inquiry into that event. Public interest in this matter will not go away. What is happening is poisoning the atmosphere, especially in Portadown. I return to the link between what happens in the prisons and the wider political process, which has the potential to unravel much of the progress that has been made. The Government need to look again at that issue.

Mr. Beggs: Does my hon. Friend agree that many prison officers sincerely harbour deep suspicion about the circumstances leading to that murder? They want a full public inquiry into the tragedy.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. He is right; I have talked to prison staff, some of whom were there on the day of Billy Wright's murder and were peripherally involved in the investigation. They are deeply concerned about what happened and believe that the good name of the Prison Service in Northern Ireland needs to be cleared on the events surrounding the murder of Billy Wright. It is crucial that the Government deal with the issue now by establishing an independent public inquiry. If that happens, we shall get at the truth of the matter once and for all.

The past 30 years have been difficult for the Northern Ireland Prison Service. I, and others, have often criticised it for inefficiencies and mistakes that have had serious consequences in the wider community, but I have also paid tribute to the staff who have worked in very difficult circumstances. Through my involvement in the Committee inquiry and my continued interest in the prison service, I have gained a better understanding of the difficulties and challenges that it faces. It is healthy that we, as elected public representatives, have a better understanding of the issues. At the same time, we believe that the conjunction of events that led to the inquiry must never happen again. We ought never again to have to face the committing of a murder in one of our prisons. I hope that the lessons that we have learned will be applied, that proper, effective security measures will be implemented, as the Government have promised, and that there will be no more escapes. If those important things can be achieved, the work of our Committee will have been worth while.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Much of what I wanted to say has already been covered, and I do not want to prolong the debate any more than necessary. Will the Minister tell us the Government's proposals to retain experienced prison staff from those currently employed in Northern Ireland prisons? There has been much talk about the excellent redundancy package that is offered to induce early retirements from the Royal Ulster Constabulary, but there has been much less comment on the package offered to prison officers. I, too, pay tribute to the service that they have provided to all the people in Northern Ireland over many difficult years. I also pay tribute to the support given by the wives and families of prison officers. There have been times when much more could have been done to assist those who were forced to leave their homes and buy more expensive properties elsewhere. In having to move for their own safety because of intimidation and terrorism, they suffered considerable financial loss as well as psychological strain, stress and upheaval. I hope that due consideration will be given to a proper package to encourage the take-up of early retirement.

I accept entirely the remarks of colleagues about the need to create facilities for a much more balanced work force in the Prison Service. However, for as long as paramilitary organisations refuse to decommission or to break down paramilitary structures, further effort will be made to establish paramilitary control in Maghaberry and elsewhere. The closure of Maze prison will not see the end of paramilitary influence.

We need to be able to expect from Prison Service management and, indeed, the Northern Ireland Office, greater influence and increased resources to ensure better training for those in prison, so that, when they have completed their sentences, they can move back into society with less risk of reoffending and returning to prison.

The Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs has done a great service. I pay tribute to all our colleagues from the mainland for the time, consideration and thoughtfulness that they put into the preparation of the report. I hope that the Minister will even be able to give us a fuller response than the somewhat short one that we received from the Secretary of State.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): I shall add a brief word on behalf of those on the Conservative Front Bench.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), who chairs the Committee and who opened our proceedings so excellently. I also congratulate all members of the Committee on the report.

I was suprised when my right hon. Friend mentioned the remarkable staff-to-prisoner ratio at the Maze prison. I nearly intervened on him, but before I did so he said that he also regarded it as remarkable, which made my point. As the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) said, we are making our observations against fixed time lines which have passed and in an atmosphere of enormous change. That atmosphere was alluded to in the Secretary of State's response to the report.

I echo my right hon. Friend's reference to the devotion to duty and security record of the Prison Service in Northern Ireland, and add my praise and respect for its work in adversity.

I have been profoundly impressed by all the speeches that I have heard today, none of which was remotely a clone of any other. The nature of comment has been extraordinary and eclectic, which has given me a remarkably vivid view from different positions of the state of the service. I shall underline the paradox of my position. I was concerned by the misgivings of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), not least about morale and absenteeism, but at the same time, paradoxically, I found myself sympathetic to the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter), who asked rhetorically whether any of us felt that we could have done any better.

Relatively new as I am to my brief, I have found today's proceedings most informative. I have been impressed by the work of the Committee, and await the Minister's response with interest.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): The hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) does not have to wait too long.

The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) clearly and precisely set out the range of issues that were required to be considered by his Committee, and he rightly paid tribute to the members of the Committee and the officials who served it. He also correctly put the debate in the context of what has been a busy week for Northern Ireland business. We have had a good attendance in the Chamber, and many thoughtful and useful contributions to the debate. I shall deal with the one jarring note—the tragic murder of Billy Wright—in due course.

I am sure that I speak for my right hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Marjorie Mowlam), who was the Secretary of State when we gave evidence to the Committee, when I say that we always received an effective grilling. It was always courteous, however, which helped the Committee to arrive at conclusions. The report is a constructive and perceptive document. It correctly identifies the strengths and weaknesses of the Northern Ireland Prison Service, and we are acting on its comments. Where strengths can be strengthened and weaknesses need strengthening, we have done that with vigour, as I shall elaborate.

When the director general, Robin Halward, met the Committee in October in a follow-up session, he discussed the developments and follow-on that he had initiated along with the senior management team, and identified where progress had been made in relation to the report and its conclusions. This afternoon, I shall not cover that ground again but shall touch on it tangentially and elaborate on how we have progressed since then.

The job of a prison officer is, at the best of times, difficult, as has been borne out by the contributions that we have heard today. It demands patience, understanding and an ability to withstand the sort of pressure that most of us would hope never to be placed under. What is true in England, Scotland and Wales is even more so in Northern Ireland, where, as the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster, among others, mentioned, 29 officers have been murdered, and many more have been injured over the past 30 years. I share in the tributes that have been paid to those officers and their families. Those officers made significant sacrifices, and their families must live with the tragic consequences. As hon. Members have said, such threats continue, and we should pay tribute to those officers who continue to serve in those difficult circumstances. They, as part of the overall delivery of governmental services in Northern Ireland, have made a major contribution to what we all hope will be the beginning of a new, peaceful future for Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) referred to the possible award of a Prison Service medal to those who have served. That will be a matter for the body responsible for such issues, the committee on the grant of honours, awards and decorations. As that body must consider the application that will be made, it would not be appropriate for me to comment now on the outcome of its deliberations. However, the hon. Gentleman's point was well made, and the proposal is progressing through the Government system, in full consultation with the staff associations responsible for those who serve in prisons.

The provision of a better service cannot be achieved in a vacuum. The Northern Ireland Prison Service and I value the fresh perspective that the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee has brought to our work and our objectives for the future. The Northern Ireland of two years ago, when the Committee began its inquiry, is a world away from the Northern Ireland of today. For the first time in a generation, Northern Ireland has an Executive, elected by and responsible to all the people of Northern Ireland, and we have the best chance yet to secure a genuine and unbreakable peace.

The Northern Ireland Prison Service, too, is experiencing unprecedented change. The early release of paramilitary prisoners has markedly changed the size and composition of the prison population, and peace will ask different questions of the Prison Service of the future. It can begin to focus on running a normal prison regime, if such a thing exists. It can break free from its traditional role of a bulwark between segregated groups of paramilitary prisoners, and it can play a more positive role in delivering broader criminal justice objectives, helping to reduce crime and the fear of crime.

The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee began its inquiry in the aftermath of the Good Friday agreement, when it became apparent that future staffing levels would have to drop by about 40 per cent. The Committee faced a barrage of questions from staff, who had real concerns about their future. That was reflected correctly in the report and was mentioned in today's debate. That period of uncertainty obviously dented staff morale.

In many ways, the Northern Ireland Prison Service was the first part of the jigsaw of putting together the changes initiated by the Good Friday agreement, which has had a major and significant impact. We have had to work hard since then in three areas to make a real difference—first, on staff management, development and morale; secondly, on some specific operational matters; and, thirdly, on inspection and accountability arrangements.

Before I say more on that, however, it is appropriate for me to deal with the tragic murder of Billy Wright and the points raised by the hon. Members for Basingstoke and for Lagan Valley. It is worth putting the matter in context. Two major inquiries into the running of the Northern Ireland Prison Service, primarily into the running of the Maze prison, resulted from that murder. The coroner also commented on it in his judgment, although it was not as a result of a full police investigation. More important, however, the Royal Ulster Constabulary undertook a thorough investigation of those events, which resulted in three people being found guilty of the murder.

I have had to meet Mr. David Wright, Billy's father. Mr. Wright is also in correspondence with me and with my right hon. friend the Secretary of State. We have had to deal with that man's grief, which is genuine. He has lost someone close, and he carries that loss with him. We have explained to Mr. Wright that, if he has new evidence, he should bring it forward by whatever means he wishes—through Ministers, through his own Member of Parliament, or more appropriately, through the RUC.

Members of Parliament may call for a public inquiry, but an inquiry would interview people who would tell it things that could have an impact. I would ask them to take that information to the RUC. They should not use the forum of a public chamber to debate the matter, as it might encourage people to think that substantial evidence was available where none exists. If there is evidence, we want to know about it. If new evidence could lead to new lines of inquiry by the RUC, it should be made available. Saying that we have not got to the bottom of the matter could be seen as a criticism of the RUC. The RUC carried out the usual thorough investigation.

Mr. Donaldson: The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands what we are driving at when we call for a public inquiry. I acknowledged that the individuals involved in the murder have been prosecuted by the RUC and that meetings have been held with the RUC to discuss the evidence in that case. However, the circumstances that surround the events that led to the murder of Billy Wright are important. I speak not only about the apprehension of those who committed the crime, but about getting to the truth of how that crime was facilitated and by whom. For instance, how did the two guns arrive in the Maze prison? I could ask many other questions, but I do not want to incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that the Minister understands that matters beyond the simple question of prosecution are of public interest and can be properly satisfied only by an independent public inquiry. Our purpose in raising the matter today is to give weight to that call. It is not a mere ritual.

Mr. Ingram: I do not want to get involved in the detail of that debate. However, people who demand public inquiries into such events usually say that there has been collusion between the RUC and the Army, or between unknown individuals somewhere in the system. The evidence obviously has to be significant before we embark on such action. We have examined the information that Mr. David Wright has given to us and that has been given to the RUC.

What happened in the case is established not by politicians or Ministers sitting in judgment, but by people who have investigative capabilities. Our advice is that the evidence that has been produced is insufficient to take us forward in that regard. If the hon. Members who are raising the issue have substantial evidence, they should make it available. It is easy to say that there is evidence or that there are questions to be asked—of course there are questions to be asked. There are probably questions in every murder inquiry that do not get answered. For example, it was never established how the weapon was brought into the prison. That was subject to investigation. If the allegation is one of collusion—that the people in the Prison Service somehow colluded in the murder—the evidence for that should not be passed to me as a Minister. If that is done, I am prepared to accept it but will immediately pass it on to the RUC. I urge other hon. Members to do the same. Such matters should be put into the process so that they can be properly investigated.

A request was made to me for Mr. Wright to visit the Maze next week, and we were able to facilitate that. I hope that that can be done quietly and without publicity because my assessment is that Mr. Wright is still carrying much grief and hurt. I would hate to see people exploiting that for their own purposes, as tends to happen—I do not make that charge against hon. Members who raised the subject today.

I was dealing with the three areas that we felt had to be examined. The first was staff. The prisoner release scheme prompted a fundamental reassessment of future prison staffing levels, and the staff reduction programme was launched in December 1998. To date, 210 staff have left the service and we expect some 1,100 staff to have left by the end of March 2001. The final date for applications to the scheme was 21 January this year, and we have received more than 900 applications. Consequently, I am pleased to say that there will be no need for compulsory redundancies, which is a significant achievement.

The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster asked about the phasing of the measure and how it would be achieved. I shall not go into that, because it is an issue for management to handle through their dealings with prison staff associations. If further information can be provided on phasing and its likely progress as we move through the process, I would be happy for it to be given to hon. Members. The way in which phasing has been handled, given the numbers that have left and the number of applications received, has been a significant achievement. It is a significant achievement for the Prison Service management, as the high take-up showed that they got their strategy and their figures right, avoiding the need for compulsory redundancy. It is also significant for prison officers, who have been able to stay or leave, depending on what is best for them. We obviously owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the service and commitment of those who are leaving.

The question of religious imbalance has been raised. It is difficult to achieve religious balance, given the major downsizing taking place. The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) gave accurate figures on the scale of take-up. Every effort is made to tackle the issue, but there are few opportunities for engagement and we are, as ever, dependent on people taking up those opportunities. Even with all the encouragement and positive spin of advertisements to persuade people from the minorities to apply, there may not necessarily be a willingness in their communities to serve in the Prison Service. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire made that point.

Mr. Barnes: Is it considered too early for the hoped for take-up of such jobs by people from the Catholic community? The peace process is at a difficult stage, and people wonder what will happen. Once it has changed the nature of Northern Ireland politics, it may become more natural for them to take up jobs in and associated with the Prison Service and the police. Targeting the Catholic community might work much better in those circumstances.

Mr. Ingram: The answer to that is broadly yes. We always have to be conscious of laws promoting positive discrimination. Laws have been changed to facilitate such an approach, not only for the Prison Service but for other aspects of the Northern Ireland economy. We all hope that Northern Ireland will become a normal society. As it does so, the climate will change and people in those communities will have the freedom to participate in the responsibilities of the state that they have not had hitherto. They will do so without the threat hanging over them of having to move home or of their families being ostracised. We hope that a normal society will evolve and, meanwhile, we will encourage the best take-up that we can from minority communities. However, we should bear in mind the fact that there are few opportunities for that to happen during downsizing.

Those who stay in the Prison Service in Northern Ireland will face new challenges and priorities. Its director general, Robin Halward, and his team have taken a fresh look at the service's mission statement "Visions and Values". It has made what it calls a future positive programme that will allow everyone to contribute in a positive way to personal development, to consider what contribution individuals can make to the development of the service and to share their views with colleagues. Everyone staying in the service will have the opportunity to participate in that programme.

We have already taken great strides to meet concerns about staff training. I am pleased to report an increase in overall levels of training, most notably in raising professional standards and developing management skills. That returns us to some of the points raised in debate. Seven hundred staff from all levels are engaged in national vocational qualification accredited programmes. Almost 600 are signed up for or are already participating in management skills programmes.

By April, we should have exceeded the service's target of five days of training and development per officer. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) said that he could not stay for my response, but he pointed out that the average number of days allocated for training was much less than that.

Those significant improvements were rewarded when five of the Prison Service's six establishments achieved Investors in People accreditation: its headquarters, training college, Magilligan prison, Maze prison and the young offenders centre. Maghaberry prison will be assessed once recent changes have bedded in. Even with that level of progress, the service will not rest on its laurels. The successes are a platform from which we are dedicated to building continuous improvement.

The management of staff absenteeism remains a primary objective of the Prison Service. We engaged management consultants to analyse our systems and recommend improvements. Those consultants found that core absence management procedures are sound, but that weaknesses exist in implementation and information gathering. In his evidence session, the director general advised the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee of the achievements of the project team that he has created to improve attendance management. By 31 December last year, the overall number of operational days lost due to absenteeism had dropped by almost 16 per cent. compared to the previous year. We aim to achieve an overall reduction of 30 per cent. from the 1998–99 baseline by March 2001.

The second group of anxieties that have been expressed in the debate and are detailed in the Committee's report relate to operational issues. The report raised a number of issues relating to prisoner accommodation and the maintenance of a full and varied regime. The closure of the Maze prison and the overall management of paramilitary and reoffending paramilitary prisoners will require a great deal of attention in the coming months, and perhaps for even longer. Full implementation of the Good Friday agreement should make it possible to close the Maze by the end of 2000. It could probably be achieved in the summer, depending on the circumstances that develop over the coming months. We are planning its smooth rundown. As the nature of the prison population changes, and as part of the overall review of the prison estate, the service is taking a fresh look at the maintenance of good order and prison discipline in all circumstances.

One priority will be to minimise the threat of bullying and intimidation without isolating people. Vulnerable prisoners in Magilligan prison are housed together in one unit with people who are not a threat to them. We plan to extend that arrangement to Maghaberry.

Like the Committee, we are worried about the fact that female juveniles are held in the young offenders wing at Maghaberry prison. The Northern Ireland Office review of the juvenile justice system is due to report shortly, and will offer solutions to what we all know is a difficult problem. Although I cannot say what those solutions will be, we have taken the matter on board and are conducting a thoroughgoing review of it, which will be issued shortly. That will then be subject to further consultation. I shall ensure that the Committee receives a copy of that report.

The Committee's report urged that operational constraints, in particular court escorting duties, should not be allowed to disrupt the delivery of a normal prison regime. A courts escort group, which was established in September 1999, allows prison governors to plan staffing levels without having to cope with the unpredictable demands made by the courts, which lead to disrupted regimes. We have begun to tackle that problem, too. In its early days, I visited the group, which generated a lot of enthusiasm on the part of the officers involved, and was beginning to show results even then. Once we are able to evaluate the benefits in staff management and financial terms and, if possible, for the RUC, which has been involved, we shall inform the Committee.

In addition, a video-link project is being piloted between the young offenders centre and the magistrates and Crown courts in Belfast. It enables remand inmates to participate in pre-trial and remand hearings and bail applications without leaving the centre. Again, I visited that project in its early stages, and I have been advised since that it is working successfully. In many ways, we are ahead of what is being done elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Perhaps we should proclaim that more, but it is another example of substantial success. We intend to extend that project to Maghaberry later this year. Maghaberry will demand a great deal of attention in the coming months. The complex population mix and the difficulties involved in maintaining a full regime at all times have recently led to several unacceptable incidents.

My primary concern is the maintenance of security, good order and control, and I have every confidence in the ability of the Prison Service to manage and, where possible, prevent such incidents. The present staff shift patterns and sick absences have militated against the full range of prison activities, and that sometimes results in reactions within the prison. We are currently involved in negotiations with the Prison Officers Association to overcome those problems. In addition, we are looking at ways to introduce an entirely new visits system, which will guarantee booked visits and enable prisons to establish better visitor identification, searching and drugs control procedures. The system will be piloted at Magilligan prison from this March.

As a next steps agency, the Northern Ireland Prison Service is due to carry out a quinquennial review, as the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster said. That will represent a welcome chance to evaluate the service's performance since it became an agency in 1995. It will determine whether agency status is the best method of operation and, if so, critically examine the relationship between the agency, the core Department and me, as the responsible Minister, in the form of a revised framework document. It will allow the service to appraise its key performance indicators and key targets in light of a changing prisoner population and closer collaboration with other parts of the criminal justice system. The review was launched in late 1999 and a wide-ranging consultation exercise has begun. I apologise if hon. Members have not received that information—we will keep them apprised of the situation as it develops. We want to involve all interested parties, including hon. Members from Northern Ireland who have an interest in the matter. An emerging findings paper will be issued in spring of this year, and we hope that the review will be completed by the summer.

I turn to the third set of issues that have been raised by the report and by hon. Members during the debate. Those relate to accountability, inspection and working arrangements with the probation service. Work is in hand to meet the Committee's worries about accountability and working arrangements with the probation service. I cannot yet give any firm indications about the precise mechanisms, because that is part of the on-going criminal justice review. That review is due to be published in the near future, and obviously any suggestions that it makes in respect of this and other issues will be subject to full consultation. It will highlight the relevant matters for the benefit of hon. Members. The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee has drawn the criminal justice review group's attention to the links between the Prison Service and the probation service, and it is therefore aware of that interest.

In the meantime, we are making important progress in other related areas. The Committee recommended that we should formalise the arrangements for the inspection of prisons by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons. I, as the Minister, and the Prison Service value our close links with the chief inspector, and share the Committee's desire to place them on a more formal footing. We have written to the Home Office and the chief inspector to take forward that recommendation.

In October, the Committee raised the lack of substantive progress on the removal of boards of visitors from the prison adjudication function. I can report that we have given boards of visitors an undertaking that we will take away that responsibility and are working towards a target date of April this year. That is an ambitious target—but important, none the less—because replacing this responsibility raises difficult issues for both for us, in the management of the Northern Ireland Prison Service, and the Home Office. We need to get it right, not least in the way in which it is conditioned by the European convention on human rights. We must ensure that we have proper systems to guarantee the safety of staff, to allow a governor to take appropriate action to maintain good order and prison discipline and to guarantee the rights of prisoners. My officials are working closely with the Home Office on those matters.

The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee recommended the establishment of a prisons ombudsman, either specifically for Northern Ireland or linked to another jurisdiction. I agree with the Committee that the resolution of prisoners' complaints through the courts is over-used, costly and often inappropriate.

The Prison Service has undertaken a fundamental review of grievance procedures and is examining the case for an ombudsman. We shall draw on experience in England, where arrangements are being reconsidered, and in Scotland, which has a system of prison-based committees. The Northern Ireland Prison Service hopes to finish gathering evidence in the coming weeks. It will then consult interested parties before moving forward. We shall, of course, keep the Select Committee informed of developments.

It is worth recording that the Prison Service already has well-established links with the probation service, both operationally in prisons and at senior management level. We continue to consider ways of improving and developing services. During recent months, both services have been working jointly to improve management and supervisory arrangements for life sentence prisoners. They are working with other statutory agencies to develop joint protocols for the assessment and management of sex offenders. At the end of last year, both services worked together on the hosting of a European conference on prisoner reintegration. They are trying to draw on wider international experience of such delicate and difficult matters.

The report of the Select Committee was a helpful reminder that in difficult circumstances we are, at least, moving in the right direction. Where we fell short, the Select Committee did not spare us. We took a long, hard look at where we must improve. Sometimes, we cannot implement measures immediately, but it is better to examine the matter to get it right so that it will last beyond the immediate future. We have studied all the conclusions carefully and are working hard to implement them.

The report and our debate today focus a critical eye on what we are doing with the Northern Ireland Prison Service and will make it a stronger and more vital organisation. The Select Committee's critical comments and examination, and the way in which the director general, with his senior management, follow the recommendations will make the Northern Ireland Prison Service a better service in the months and years ahead. Much will depend on the sort of society in which it exists. We all want a different and better society than we have had in the past 30 years.

Question put and agreed to.

Anti-Social Behaviour Orders

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Touhig.]

10 am

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on a problem that we all recognise as one of the most serious facing many of our constituents—anti-social behaviour. Constituents come to my surgeries and those of many hon. Members with all sorts of problems involving anti-social behaviour.

The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provided a range of new orders for tackling anti-social behaviour. One is the anti-social behaviour order, the purpose of which is to allow the police and local authorities to deal effectively with people who persistently seriously harass, alarm and cause distress to others. The local authority or the police may now apply to a magistrates court for an order to protect people from those who persistently make their lives a misery. The police and local authorities asked for that power because there was a gap in the legislation and they wanted it filled. They needed a quick and effective measure to tackle such behaviour, so the Government responded and provided the new laws.

We have all had constituents coming to our surgeries with horrific stories. What do they ask for when they come to see us? They want the opportunity for themselves and others to live peaceful and law-abiding lives. The anti-social behaviour order has teeth, so ordinary people do not need to take the action that they may feel too intimidated to take. It can be taken on their behalf, so they can remain anonymous and avoid further intimidation. One of the most appalling aspects of anti-social behaviour is that many people feel intimidated and unable to seek redress through the law. I have had people in my surgeries saying that they hoped no one saw them come in. The purpose of the orders is to remove the fear of intimidation by providing an opportunity for professional witnesses to be involved.

I am sure that most hon. Members could list a catalogue of experiences, and I shall give one or two examples of unacceptable behaviour that must be dealt with. I emphasise at the outset that, although I shall refer to experiences from my constituency, the vast majority of my constituents in Gedling in Nottingham are peaceful and law-abiding and want action to be taken against what is a very small minority. If I were to name any constituents who had experienced such behaviour, they would worry about being identified in a local newspaper report. Therefore, I must speak in general terms to demonstrate the scale of the problem. One constituent was persistently harassed, threatened and physically abused by a neighbour. Indeed, at one point the neighbour seemed to be taking pot shots at my constituent with an air rifle. It is difficult to believe that such things happen, but unfortunately they are all too common.

In my constituency, groups of youths gather every evening in a children's playground that is surrounded by houses. They drink, urinate on the swings and fornicate on the slide. Anyone who tries to reason with them is verbally and physically intimidated. Why should those who are going about their everyday business or watching television in the evening have to deal with such problems, only to be mooned at by young people? We seem to underestimate the extent to which people are intimidated by such behaviour. Youths have also been riding bikes around the corridors of an old people's complex in my constituency with bats in their hands. One can imagine the terror that that provokes. They stand in the streets and drink, throw stones at windows and act in a threatening and intimidating manner. Moreover, there are numerous examples of neighbour nuisance. People carry on unlawful activities without planning permission and carry out all manner of repairs in their garages at all times of the day.

Of course, I complain to the police and local authorities about such behaviour. They take action, and the behaviour stops—for a few days or a week. However, as far as ordinary people are concerned, an end point is never reached because no one is ever held accountable and punished. They also feel that parents are failing to accept responsibility for the behaviour of their children. Most of such offenders are young, and we must ensure that they do not get away with their crimes and that their parents are also held responsible. We are talking about not petty or trivial crimes, but the sort of crimes and anti-social behaviour that people experience in their communities and about which they want something done. My constituents express fears not about major crime—important though that issue is—but about the behaviour to which I have referred.

People often feel that, in trying to deal with such problems, they are coming up against a brick wall. The local authority tells them that it is a matter for the police, and the police say that it is a matter for the local authority. As a result, people feel that nothing can be done and nobody is responsible.

Anti-social behaviour must be dealt with quickly and firmly. I have urged Gedling borough council, in conjunction with the police, to use anti-social behaviour orders to deal with the many cases that have been brought to my attention. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 has encouraged local authorities, the police and housing departments and agencies to work together. It has changed the culture, which is a major plus.

Gedling borough council has had a crime reduction strategy during the past two or three years, and has set itself high targets in priority areas such as domestic burglary and working with young people. It has tried to provide additional facilities such as shelters and basketball courts, and has carried out liaison work with the Guinness Trust—a local partner—to try to discourage vandalism. In addition, council officers have spent a considerable time in liaison meetings with the police, as part of their work against anti-social behaviour. There is a community safety partnership that encompasses Gedling borough council, Nottinghamshire county council and the Nottinghamshire police, assisted by the health authority and the probation service. Gedling borough council and Nottinghamshire police do good work together—the encouragement of such collaboration is one of the most positive aspects of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

Despite the appalling behaviour that I have outlined—and the appalling behaviour described by other hon. Members in their constituencies—not one anti-social behaviour order has been implemented in my constituency, even though great consideration has been given to the idea.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Has the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to study the Hansard report of the Committee stage of the Crime and Disorder Bill, when the complexity of the anti-social behaviour order provisions was discussed at length? Opposition Members were worried that that complexity would lead to great difficulty in using those orders in practice. Does he agree that the Opposition were right on that point?

Mr. Coaker: This is an important debate, and we need to try to build a consensus and a way forward. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has written to local authorities and chief constables to ask them what practical problems exist in relation to the implementation of anti-social behaviour orders. Later in my remarks, I shall refer to one or two of the problems that local police and authorities have drawn to my attention. It is important that anti-social behaviour orders are implemented. They are good things, and any difficulties or problems with their implementation should be brought to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister so that a way forward can be found. That is the point of today's debate. It is in all our interests to tackle the kinds of behaviour that I have mentioned. No doubt the hon. Gentleman's constituents have told him about such behaviour.

As I said, not one anti-social behaviour order has been implemented in my constituency. The latest figures show that only 10 have been implemented nationally. That is of concern to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and my hon. Friend the Minister will probably want to comment on it.

In Nottingham, the city council has made a 14-year-old boy the subject of an anti-social behaviour order. One order has therefore been implemented in the greater Nottingham area. It is amazing to think that that young man had been convicted 55 times in the past two years on charges including theft, taking vehicles, robbery, burglary, handling stolen goods and motoring offences. Many people have asked me why it has taken two years for an anti-social behaviour order to be applied, or for the law to deal with somebody who is clearly terrorising a neighbourhood. People are staggered by it, and, in all honesty, I find it difficult to provide an answer. One would have thought that at some stage, even if an anti-social behaviour order were not appropriate, another care provision—or criminal provision—should have been appropriate. However, the use of the order sent a powerful message to that local community and to many others across the greater Nottingham conurbation. I hope that it is the first of many such orders.

The important factor is that the young man's breaking of the order meant that he had committed a criminal offence and was put into secure accommodation. Consequently, the people who had been terrorised began to experience some peace in their communities. People continually complain to me that we appear to be more concerned about the human rights of those who commit offences than those of the victims who are being terrorised. A better balance is needed.

I want more use of these powers by local authorities and the police, because people all over the country want an end point to the problems that they face through tougher, quicker action and zero tolerance.

To refer to the comments of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), the lack of use of anti-social behaviour orders has been a matter of concern for my hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Many hon. Members will have seen the Home Secretary's letter to all chief executives of local authorities, which was copied to chief constables, asking them to detail their problems in implementing the legislation and encouraging them to start to use the orders to deal with anti-social behaviour.

The letter makes the important point to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks, asking those concerned to tell the Home Secretary if there are problems in implementing the orders. It also states that the Government will consider the possibility of amending the legislation. In the spirit of trying to draw a consensus, we need the orders and partnerships to work, because they are for the benefit of our constituents.

I draw to my hon. Friend the Minister's attention a couple of matters that the police have raised with me about the anti-social behaviour order. They sometimes find its requirements to be too bureaucratic and complex—more complex, in some circumstances, than those of previous public order legislation. A case conference and other consultations have to take place before the application for the order, and a great burden of evidence is required. In the interests of a quick and efficient process, we had all hoped that would not happen. The weight of evidence that is required is often so off-putting that the police and local authorities decide that they cannot obtain it, and therefore cannot pursue an order because it would be thrown out of court. Another problem that has been relayed to me is that it is necessary for witnesses to attend court at the application stage, which is conducted under civil law. The police in my constituency tell me that the courts require that evidence be given at the application stage in the presence of the suspect. One of the greatest problems in tackling anti-social behaviour is the intimidation that people often feel, and one of the intentions of the legislation was to help to overcome that problem.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister use this occasion to remind the police and local authorities that anti-social behaviour orders are not a measure of last resort and that they are fully consistent with human rights legislation? If used quickly and effectively, they can nip problems in the bud. They can prevent serious offending and lawlessness arising from minor matters, if those matters are dealt with strongly and sternly, straight away.

I often seem to be in a minority with some of my opinions, but I believe that we ought to be very hard on people the first time that they do something wrong, rather than wait for them to commit a lot of offences and then be hard on them. If they then continue to offend, they really do need help, because the vast majority of people will learn from being punished at the outset.

Will the Minister comment on the effectiveness of parenting orders? Many people feel that parents should have a greater sense of responsibility. It could be very effective if the police sometimes took people home in the back of a patrol car and said to their parents, "Do you realise what your son or daughter has just been doing?" I have been horrified at some of the things that my son and daughter have done, but I have tried to deal with it. All parents know that teenagers are not easy to deal with. However, some parents abrogate all responsibility for their children's behaviour.

I believe that 10 is too young for child curfews, which are part of the consultation process. Will the Minister consider extending the provisions to encompass older children? I would prefer a minimum age of 16.

As the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) will no doubt point out, not all young people are involved in anti-social behaviour. I do not want to give the impression that they are. Many young people belong to uniformed organisations such as the Scouts and the Guides, and they are great. Many also take part in charity work. The problems that we are discussing do not affect the vast majority of young people. I recently spoke to sixth form students at Christ the King school in my constituency as part of UNICEF's "Put it to your MP" day. They were as concerned as anyone else about anti-social behaviour in their area, because the vandals have often vandalised the facilities that they want to use, such as youth clubs. Those students asked me what could be done about such anti-social behaviour, because they were worried about it and wanted it to be dealt with.

The Government have laid the foundations for crime reduction. They have established numerous crime reduction partnerships across the country, made huge investments in closed circuit television, made available crime-fighting funds to boost police recruitment and improved police communications. Alongside the introduction of anti-social behaviour orders, there are provisions for a radical overhaul of the youth justice system, fast-track punishment for persistent offenders, final cautions and referral orders with youth offender panels—the last of which is being piloted in Gedling.

In addition, there are measures to tackle the causes of crime—including the new deal for communities and the new deal for the unemployed—and measures to tackle social exclusion and truancy in schools. The Government have provided a framework for crime reduction within which we can start to tackle the problem of anti-social behaviour. That problem affects all of us. The police, local authorities, housing and health authorities, the Government and councils need to work together at local level to tackle the problem. We need to encourage a society that recognises and respects the rights and responsibilities of individuals and promotes a sense of community.

Anti-social behaviour orders are a highly effective approach that could make a huge difference to the victims of anti-social behaviour or harassment by neighbours. This important issue affects the lives of many of our constituents. An appropriate framework exists, but we should consider whether improvements could be made to it. Our constituents deserve a better deal from the anti-social behaviour orders, which should be used more frequently. The Government have given local authorities and the police significant powers, and they should use them to protect our communities from a small anti-social minority.

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) on raising this important subject. The examples that he gave from his constituency are, sadly, repeated in virtually every constituency in the country.

I stress a point that the hon. Gentleman made near the end of his speech: that the vast majority of young people are not guilty of anti-social behaviour—it is a tiny minority who give the rest a bad name. The examples that the hon. Gentleman gave—we shall doubtless hear more examples from others—show that the Government's anti-social behaviour orders are not working, although they were contained in flagship legislation. It is not clear whether six or 10 orders have been served nationwide, but either way the total is minute. The expectation was that the Government would be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime, but they have not been.

The Liberal Democrats do not oppose the anti-social behaviour orders in principle and we did not vote against the legislation, but we and the Conservatives raised several concerns when it was passing through the House. For example, we were concerned that the standard of evidence was too weak. The Home Secretary has written letters to local authorities and police chiefs urging—indeed, begging—them to implement this flagship legislation, but the fact that only 10 orders have been served confirms that the legislation is too weak. The fact that the associated criminal sanctions are severe may explain why there is reluctance to impose more orders. Some civil liberty groups have claimed that mixing civil and criminal standards means that the anti-social behaviour orders may breach the European convention on human rights.

Liberal Democrats have raised concerns about the wide definition of anti-social behaviour, which includes harassment, alarm and distress. A letter that was published in yesterday's East Anglian Daily Times appeared to some to incite the pro-hunting lobby in East Anglia to descend on and protest outside my home. Would not that letter cause harassment, alarm or distress to my family and my neighbours? It was written not by an ordinary member of the public, but by the chairman of the Colchester Conservative association, who is involved in our democratic process.

Liberal Democrats and Conservatives raised the possibility that merely eccentric activities that are peculiar to individual minority ethnic communities could be perceived by some as involving anti-social behaviour, although there would be no public interest in taking legal action. The Government argued that proper guidance would be available and that there was no danger that eccentric behaviour would be targeted—so morris dancers are safe. Furthermore, ASBOs were designed partly to respond to people who were causing harassment, alarm or distress to ethnic minorities.

[Mr. Bob Russell]

We did not believe that ASBOs should be the first port of call for the police and local councils, as the hon. Member for Gedling emphasised. The orders are serious and should be a last resort. The Government gave those assurances in Committee. We also wanted assurances about the use of the orders in cases involving young people.

Since ASBOs were introduced, some people have tried to highlight the Home Secretary's embarrassment that they have not been widely used. Whether the numbers involved are six or 10, either way they are not large. ASBOs were a high-profile plank of the Home Secretary's law and order agenda to crack down on anti-social behaviour, and were presented as part of the Government's zero tolerance approach. According to the Home Office, the threat of an ASBO is a good deterrent. That is difficult to measure or prove, although it is bound to be true to some extent. However, we continue to face the midnight do-it-yourself building workers and ghetto blasters into the early hours of the morning.

The hon. Member for Gedling referred to anti-social behaviour in children's playgrounds. A tiny minority cause a lot of distress to a lot of people and unfairly tar all young people with the same brush. One response from the Home Secretary was to blame wealthy liberal lawyers with no experience of what it is like to live in areas with anti-social behaviour for undermining and criticising the measures.

My party does not oppose the orders in principle. We warned that they might raise unrealistic expectations, and what we have heard today, as well as evidence from the Home Secretary, confirms that. Local councils and the police may be reluctant to request such strong orders, and the courts may be reluctant to issue them. The Home Office should revisit the legislation and consider what improvements might be made. Furthermore, it is entirely inappropriate to blame lawyers for expressing their anxieties about the human rights implications. The Government should have been more careful in drafting the orders.

We must also take into account what has happened in the past two years. We face a scene of police cuts throughout the country and particularly in my county of Essex. On the plus side, we have heard good stories about local authorities such as Gedling district council, to which I would add Colchester borough council, which installed closed circuit television security cameras with minimal support from the previous Government, the funds having been largely raised locally.

The involvement of young people is vital. If the Government want their joined-up thinking to be taken seriously, it is not good enough constantly to harp on about raising academic standards and about school league tables, because that gives the message that young people who are not academically gifted are of less worth to society. That message is being sent out, albeit unintentionally, and all three political parties are to blame.

A further problem is the playing down of sport and activities for young people. I invite the Minister to conduct a three-month experiment. Every young person entering a young offenders institution should fill out a simple questionnaire on whether they have ever been a member of a recognised, but not necessarily uniformed, youth organisation, and if so, which ones and for how long. We could then ascertain whether a pattern can be discerned of young offenders coming from a background in which youth organisations have played no part. Investing in our young people at an early stage will result in there being less anti-social behaviour as they hit their teens—or, indeed, even younger.

Finally, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we should not put anti-social behaviour orders in a compartment on their own. There is a lot more to the matter, including education, youth movements, and sport and leisure activities. The problems highlighted by the hon. Member for Gedling apply throughout the country. If we can achieve the consensus that he called for, the Government will be able to deliver on the expectations that they raised two or three years ago.

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. Members will wish to know that the House has ordered that a non-regular occupant of the Chair in Westminster Hall should be addressed by name and not as Deputy Speaker. My name is Mr. Jones.

I now call Mr. St. Aubyn.

10.35 am

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Thank you, Mr. Jones. May I be the first Conservative Member to congratulate the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) on his display of new Labour machismo on the fight against crime. However, I am sure that he, like me, is sometimes disappointed in the Government's response.

I wondered this morning whether the hon. Gentleman was applying for a job in the Whips Office, to help deal with a delinquent element in the Labour party. He spoke eleoquently about the crime on some estates in his part of the country—a problem that is shared by other areas, even Surrey. I represent the people of Guildford, and my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and I both know that our county does not suffer problems on the same scale as other parts of the country, but we certainly have a problem. Also as a former London councillor I know how difficult such problems can be for neighbours and others who suffer as a result.

The Government talk about crime with a forked tongue. At the same time as talking tough about anti-social behaviour orders, they allowed into the country last week one of the most anti-social people in the world. Mr. Tyson was convicted and sent to prison for a terrible crime and his record in the boxing ring is little short of disgraceful—so much so that many people thought that he should have been banned from boxing for life, as he nearly was. Allowing such a person into the country was a retrograde step. Banning him from entering the country would have done as much good as 100 anti-social behaviour orders and would have sent out a clear message to those who might otherwise be tempted to regard him as a role model.

I wish to concentrate on the orders as they were originally intended to be applied to disaffected youth. The Home Office guidance stated:

"Applications may routinely be made for the middle and older age groups of juveniles and young people (e.g. 12-17 year olds) as experience has shown that such individuals may commit serious acts of anti-social behaviour without adult encouragement or involvement."

That group was to be targeted by the ASBO, and we heard that curfews would be imposed on teenagers who caused disruption in a neighbourhood. According to a survey undertaken by the BBC last September, not only have no curfew orders been imposed under ASBOs, but, as the hon. Member for Gedling said, we are aware of only 10 orders having been made at all. The strategy has failed.

The Government have also been reluctant to implement provisions introduced by the previous Government that might be more effective against anti-social behaviour. For example, the Government have been asked several times to introduce the remand provisions of sections 152 and 158 of the Housing Act 1996. In July, Ministers told the House that they were in discussion on the matter with the Lord Chancellor's Department and that they would inform hon. Members when they had reached a decision. So far as I can tell, no decision has yet been reached. I hope that the Minister will tell us when those provisions will come into force.

The previous Government made a great deal of progress in giving local authorities powers to deal with anti-social behaviour on council estates. The Housing Act 1985 strengthened powers of eviction and gave local authorities the powers to bring in byelaws that might control anti-social behaviour. I have already mentioned the 1996 Act, which introduced powers to bring injunctions against anti-social behaviour. It also introduced introductory tenancies, whereby tenants are in a sense under review for the first year of tenancy. They have been used by up to half our local authorities.

In that context, what do ASBOs add to the fight against anti-social behaviour? Before any such measure is judged, we must ask what the sanction is if the order is ignored. It is severe. The Home Office guidance on ASBOs states:

"Breach of an order . . . is a criminal offence triable either way with a maximum penalty on indictment of 5 years in prison."

Even for the language of new Labour machismo, that sounds over the top, and that is the problem. The sanction is far too strong to use against teenagers who display anti-social behaviour. It is not credible to threaten children of 15 or 16 with being sent to prison for five years. The sanction is not workable. Therefore, local authorities are put in the invidious position of invoking an order that may then be ignored and are left in a quandary as to what to do if the process is discredited. Sometimes they hold the order like a sword of Damocles over the youths, while knowing at the back of their minds that using it is a high-risk strategy with that group.

Mr. Coaker: The hon. Gentleman is making a point about the deterrent involved in someone breaking an ASBO. The example that I gave about a youth in Nottingham—I appreciate the fact that there are not many such examples—was that the ASBO was broken and, as that was a criminal offence, the youth was sent to a secure unit. I cannot remember how long he was there, but it was a huge relief to local people. It showed the effectiveness of the sanction, and in my view acted as quite an effective deterrent in and beyond the local community.

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): I remind hon. Members that interventions must be brief.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I was about to say that, in extreme cases, there may be a justification for removing someone behaving anti-socially from a locality. That is surely a feature of the powers given to local government in recent years.

If the hon. Gentleman will let me, I shall draw a parallel between the use of ASBOs on estates and exclusion orders in schools—an issue that the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) and I considered in detail when we served on the Select Committee on Education and Employment. We examined the subject of disaffected children, the group that our debate on ASBOs is about. We made some interesting findings. The fifth report of the Committee from 1997–98 says that "they are predominantly male . . .; they are drawn disproportionately from African-Caribbean backgrounds; children looked after by local authorities are disproportionately represented; they include a high proportion of young offenders; many are likely to come from difficult and disrupted family backgrounds; they frequently lack self-confidence and self-esteem; they tend to have few 'basic skills; many have emotional and behavioural difficulties; there is a high prevalence of risk-taking behaviour, for instance in relation to smoking, substance abuse and early sexual activity."

That group is also more likely to be among those who behave in an anti-social manner on the estates where they live.

We felt that to exclude this type of child from school was not necessarily the right response. Clearly it is necessary, particularly when a school is failing and must be turned around, to make dramatic changes, among which may be a need to exclude the most disruptive pupils. That is very much in the school's interests, and we must keep the interests of the majority of children in mind in such cases. However, unless we are, in parallel terms, talking about a failing estate, one wonders whether excluding a child from an estate is the right response. We know that taking children out of the normal family environment can be harmful, and that children in care have low educational attainments, as the report has identified. That places them on a cycle of low achievement and dismal prospects, which may be with them for the rest of their lives.

We must look at alternative strategies for the council and housing estates where this problem is prevalent. Like many local authorities, Guildford borough council has not used ASBOs. However, in the last 18 months it has appointed a nuisance investigation officer to deal with these cases, who typically deals with one case a day. That is the type of mediation role often needed, not just for juveniles, but for other disputes on estates. Mediation provided by a specified officer of the local council or an outside mediation service may be more effective in bringing home to those concerned their responsibilities, although we must always accept and require that other sanctions are necessary and should be available.

The sanctions of the introductory tenancy and the ability to evict a perpetrator are powerful and should not be ignored. Nor should the sanctions of the injunction or the use of byelaws, but we need a more imaginative response to disaffected children that involves other Departments. What discussions has the Minister had with his former colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment? Many disaffected children find that the academic rigour of a GCSE course is simply not for them; in many cases they may not have attained the basic skills necessary to achieve a result on such a course. Alternative strategies for them must be developed, particularly for those aged 14 and over.

There is good evidence that children over 14 who are put into a more adult environment—for instance, at their local further education college—may strive much harder when given the responsibility that such an environment requires of them. Indeed, if they are given work places, they may get to know role models, the slightly older people in that workplace, whom they can see have money in their pockets and a future—something to which they can aspire if they can attain basic skills and put them to good use. It is about setting the right example, which goes back to my earlier point about the incident last week. The ASBO's scope is therefore extremely limited.

We could also look at the overall design of estates. When I was a councillor in Paddington, I sat on a housing committee that visited some of the failed estates built in the 1960s and 1970s, which had often failed partly because of the way in which they had been designed. The belief was that long corridors of communication at every level of the flats would engender social cohesion, but, unfortunately, they simply provided the criminal element on the estates with a ready escape route. When we visited the Mozart estate, we decided to do some basic redesign. Many long walkways were bricked up, creating smaller clusters of accommodation and, therefore, a greater sense of identity among council tenants. That went some way towards improving behaviour on the estate.

I would welcome the Minister's comments on how ASBOs and other powers can be brought to bear on those who have exercised the right to buy on council estates. Some tenants in my constituency are complaining about a neighbouring family that has exercised the right to buy and is exhibiting anti-social behaviour towards those around it. The council has found that its powers are more constrained than if the family were still a tenant of the council.

We need a clear view from the Minister of what other action he will take on remand orders and on making agents of the law-enforcement process more aware of ASBOs. In July, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) suggested a training programme for magistrates on the implementation of ASBOs, and a national demonstration project was proposed, which the Home Secretary described as "an excellent idea, which I shall pursue."—[Official Report, 12 July 1999, Vol. 335, c. 16.]

Will the Minister tell the Committee today, six months later, what the Home Secretary has done about a national demonstration project to highlight the advantages of using ASBOs?

As I said at the outset, it is difficult to know what is happening behind the machismo and new Labour spin. How serious are the Government about tackling the real problems? The evidence from the hon. Member for Gedling is that not enough is happening. That, ultimately, is the fault of the Government.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) on securing the debate. I had not intended to speak, but I was moved to do so by the contributions from my former colleague on the Select Committee on Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), and from the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell). The charge that the Government are not addressing the needs of young people and those who are disaffected with the activities of the majority of young people, whether sport, youth activities or attending school, is astonishing. The Government have put more money into education, starting with the early years, to assist such children. There is a sure start programme in my constituency, which is aimed at families with children under four. We know that disaffection, unfortunately, can start as early as that. In the past few days, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has stated that opportunities should be examined for vocational education with a less academic strand for 14 to 19-year-olds. The hon. Member for Guidlford and I discussed that in the Select Committee, which recommended that the Government should consider such opportunities.

Exclusion has been considered. My authority has one of the highest exclusion rates in the country, and that is in a predominantly white area where less than 1 per cent. of the community comes from ethinic minorities. In the Doncaster area we are considering the introduction of learning mentors, different ways in which to keep young people in school, even if they are not in the same classroom as everyone else for part of the day, and how we can tackle disaffection among young people. There are real problems in some of our communities and not just on council estates. In some mixed tenancy communities, harassment and intimidation occur daily and do not arise only from young people. Anti-social behaviour orders apply not only to young people, but to grown-ups who make people's lives a misery day in and day out.

I am worried that individuals and departments in the local community may thwart the purpose of the orders and the way in which they can be coupled with other opportunities to tackle issues relating to intimidation and harassment. There is evidence of non-compliance, even if it is well intentioned. Everyone must abide by certain laws and certain ways of treating each other, whether in the family, the community or the country. Most of the population, for most of the time, abide by the rules that we, as a community, decide that we should have. Jean-Jacques Rousseau said that people could do whatever they wanted as long as it did not harm anyone else, which, in some sense, is a philosophy by which we tend to try to run our lives.

Some people in our community, however, have not been brought up to obey any rules about how they should live. Children are brought up with no parameters of what is right or wrong, against the law, legal, or of the right way to behave towards an elderly lady walking down the street, an Asian family living in isolation, or their fellow human beings. That is a sad reflection on our time. We need to establish parameters, whether in school, where there is a set of rules about how pupils should behave, in the wider community in terms of policing, or in quality of life and how we live with our neighbours. We need to say, "There is a line over which we do not accept you can go." Anti-social behaviour orders have a role to play in that.

Despite all the good intentions of the Government, the direction that they want to give, and the opportunities that they want to provide—for goodness sake—to people at the sharp end who have to pick up the pieces for victims of behaviour that threatens so many people's lives, the orders are not being used. I have had separate discussions with my local authority and the police about that. Some crime and disorder partnerships spend a long time talking about and creating bureaucratic protocols, but, when push comes to shove, and something needs to be done, no one wants to take responsibility. Alternatively, one part of the partnership might not want to take responsibility. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to give closer consideration to what is blocking the achievement of our aim of creating a safer and friendlier community.

I am interested by the comments about the design of estates, and the environment in which we live. There is no doubt that some estates almost invite crime. Motor bikes can zoom across them, and people can carry drugs from one estate to another to escape the police; they can move around at will. There is also no doubt that an environment in which everything is falling down is not a pleasant place to live. I read in my local paper this week that the Government have released further money from the sale of council houses to help to improve estates. With that regeneration money, there is no doubt that the Government aim to tackle that aspect of people's quality of life. However, it would be a crying shame and a waste of funds if we were to spend good taxpayer's money on rebuilding and refurbishing estates that the minority of people who cause mayhem tore down again. In 10 years' time, we would have to inject more money to refurbish estates and redecorate houses, and to make those communities look nice. Looking nice is not enough; there must be a community pact about the way in which people behave and treat each other. That is part of the jigsaw in which anti-social behaviour orders are meant to work.

It saddens me that councils often claim that they have no powers over private tenants. In my constituency, there are a number of communities in which mixed tenure is common. People own their council houses, and have private landlords. Getting private or absentee landlords to take responsibility for tenants has been a special problem. If these orders should have been applied anywhere, it is in that area. I am sad to say that that is yet to happen in Don Valley.

I have spoken with passion on this matter, because I care about young people and I care about disaffection. A multi-strand approach is necessary, but, at the same time, children and adults need to know that there is a proper way to treat people in the community. Creating such parameters may be our last chance to tell young people what is right and wrong before they move on to crime. I speak as an hon. Member who has in my constituency three prisons and one of the best young offenders establishments in the country.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I join in congratulating the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Croaker) on securing this debate on a subject that concerns us all and on the persistence with which he has pursued this issue. This is not the first time that he has discussed this matter—he asked questions about the orders last year, on 11 June, on 16 June at column 161, on 12 July at column 15 and on 1 November at column 57. He has constantly held the Government to account and he has a record to be proud of. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) said that he suspected that the hon. Member for Gedling might be auditioning for entry to the Whip's Office. However, the hon. Gentleman said that when he advances the views that he expressed today he normally finds himself in a minority of one. If he talked to Conservative Members more often, he would find that his views were widely shared, and he might discover that he had found his political friends.

Under this Labour Government, Oppositon Members often feel like Cassandra crying in the wilderness—we predict the effect of Government legislation, but Ministers do not listen to us. It is rare for Opposition Members' comments in Committee to be found to be accurate so quickly after the introduction of an Act, but that has happened in this case. The concerns that we raised in Committee about workability have been echoed by Labour Members, including the hon. Members for Gedling and for Don Valley (Caroline Flint).

I served on the Standing Committee that considered the Crime and Disorder Bill, and it is interesting to revisit that debate. The concerns that were raised this morning by the hon. Members for Gedling, for Don Valley and for Colchester (Mr. Russell) were raised in Committee by Opposition Members. Labour Members might be shocked to re-read that debate, especially in view of the Pepper v. Hart decision, which means that Ministers' observations in Committee can be cited as an indication of the intended purpose of an Act.

The then Home Office Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who now spends his time in the Welsh Assembly, made it abundantly clear—this may come as a shock to the Labour Members who have spoken today—that the legislation was not intended to deal with young or juvenile criminals. He said:

> "First, in respect of juveniles, I must make it clear that they are not the main targets of these orders. Their use against juveniles . . . would be exceptional. They may be used because the juvenile is one of several members of a family involved in a pattern of behaviour. . . . An order would not be issued in isolation, but as part of an attempt to tackle the general problem."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 30 April 1998; c. 51.]

My hon. Friends the Members for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), for Woking (Mr. Malins) and for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) and I pointed out in an extensive debate that the proposal was completely at odds with announcements that were made by the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) before the general election, when he said that such orders would tackle youth crime. After the general election, when he had become Home Secretary, he foreshadowed what became the Crime and Disorder Bill in many speeches that he gave about tackling youth crime. My hon. Friends and I said in Committee that the legislation was an over-bureaucratic response that would not deal with the problem. A mere 18 months later, Labour Members are now saying that there have been only 10 such orders in the country. The hon. Member for Don Valley spoke in evocative terms of there being too much bureaucracy and talk—

Caroline Flint: Perhaps I should clarify my remarks. I said that, on the ground, the Government's policy is being thwarted by a tendency towards over-bureaucracy, not by a lack of willingness to enforce such orders. The problem lies not with the Government, but with the way in which the policy is being implemented.

Mr. Hawkins: I understood what the hon. Lady said. The underlying point of her speech, which she has ignored, is that the legislation created the bureaucracy. It was the Government who introduced an overly complex way in which to bring forward such orders. Hon. Members need not take my word for it. Sir Jeremy Beecham, who is not a known Conservative supporter, has written in Criminal Justice Management about the small number of orders. He said:

"There are two main reasons for this—the highly complex nature of getting one in place", combined with the belief that an order should be seen very much as a last resort. In that article, Sir Jeremy, who is chairman of the Local Government Association and a well-known Labour figure in local government circles, talks about the difficulty of getting clearance from a council department:

"there are all the problems of court procedures. Councils are rightly concerned about protection for witnesses in these cases ... with the Orders being carried through the Magistrates courts there is no protection for them"— and no protection for witnesses—

"once the hearing is started."

Sir Jeremy, who, as I said, is a leading Labour figure in local government, and who is talking about his own Government's orders, continues:

"What we now have is a situation where the law does not solve the problems it was supposed to. There has been criticism that it hasn't been thought out on a practitioner's level."

Indeed. There was criticism from the Opposition Front Bench when the orders were debated in Committee.

Yet again, the Government's proposals are based on good intentions. We all know that anti-social behaviour is a huge problem, as this debate has demonstrated. Since being called to the Bar some 20 years ago, I have had extensive experience of prosecuting such cases in the courts. The Opposition pointed out during the passage of the Crime and Disorder Bill that it introduced a procedure so complex that it would not work. No less a figure than Sir Jeremy Beecham now says that it has not worked—a point repeated by Labour Members today. We have been proved right in only 18 months.

As we all know, the road to hell is paved with good intentions. The Government have failed to understand that we must listen to those at the sharp end. For a procedure to work in the criminal courts, it must have one cardinal virtue: it must be simple and straightforward, and must ensure that decisions can be taken quickly and simply. Instead, the legislation has imposed a requirement for long and complex discussions between local authority departments and the police. As the hon. Members for Colchester and for Gedling pointed out, all the agencies that must implement the provision have good intentions, and we are not criticising them. However, the provison is not working—and I am not alone in saying that. As chairman of the Local Government Association, Sir Jeremy Beecham talks to local authorities across the country and he, too, is saying that it is not working. The Government must revisit the problem and think again.

The hon. Member for Colchester is right to say that we are talking about only a minority of young people and problem families. If my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford and I have the opportunity to revisit the problem after the next general election, when I hope that a Conservative Government will be elected, we will ensure that a simple procedure is put in place. When this over-complex and over-bureaucratic legislation is replaced, decisions about such prosecutions should be put purely and simply in the hands of the police, because the bobby on the beat on the problem estate knows the nature of the difficulties.

I do not for a moment suggest that employees of local authorities should not also be involved—they can give the police evidence about the difficulties that a problem family is causing to local authority staff. Usually one finds that such a family causes problems for every agency with which it comes into contact. However, if the decision to prosecute simply rested with the police—after all, that is the way in which the courts have traditionally worked—it would not be necessary to have umpteen meetings involving representatives from all the relevant departments of the local authority. There should be a straightforward decision to prosecute so that the matter can be brought to court.

The legislation should be amended so that it is targeted at the areas where many of the problems arise, especially in respect of young hooligans. As the hon. Member for Gedling pointed out, such cases often involve gangs of youths—yet the Minister says that the orders were not intended to deal with juveniles. Quelle surprise, therefore, that they have not been used to deal with the kinds of abuse the hon. Gentleman described.

This valuable debate has revealed, beyond peradventure, the need for the 1998 Act to be amended to deal properly with the problem. It is not only the anti-social behaviour orders, but the child curfew orders, that have not been used.

The hon. Member for Gedling referred to a case that occurred near his constituency in Nottingham, about which I have some press coverage. The newspaper states that Councillor Colin Chapman, the leader of Nottingham city council—

Mr. Coaker: Graham.

Mr. Hawkins: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I am merely reading from the article.

Mr. Coaker: We cannot believe everything we read in the papers.

Mr. Hawkins: That is true. The newspaper has failed to get the hon. Gentleman's local council leader's name correct, which is extraordinary. Perhaps he is not even a household name in his own city.

Councillor Chapman said:

"People are fed up with children like these getting away time and again".

I congratulate people in cities such as Nottingham on the hard work that they have done in trying to find a way through the bureaucratic maze. They have not found it easy. If the article is to be believed—I should point out that it is from The Guardian, so perhaps it is not surprising that it got the name wrong—the council leader said that three similar cases were being prepared. That would mean that only four cases were in progress. Sadly, I am sure that there are far more problem cases than that in a city the size of Nottingham, and simpler legislation must be introduced to deal with them.

I have a cutting from the Glasgow Herald about a case in Edinburgh that involved a complaint relating to full volume blasts from Celine Dion, Shania Twain, The Beautiful South and Aerosmith. Although it may be enormously enjoyable to listen to those groups at normal volume, when they issue from a ghetto blaster at full volume, repeatedly disrupting neighbours' lives, that is bound to cause a major problem. I know from my practice at the Bar and from dealing with surgery cases that the broadcasting of very loud music late at night by problem families causes enormous upset and distress, especially to the elderly and families with young children.

The case in Liverpool that involved one of the first anti-social behaviour orders received a great deal of publicity, and was met with a rather hysterical reaction on the part of the Home Secretary. He blamed the fact that so few orders were being imposed on trendy civil rights lawyers who, having defended such people, jumped into their BMWs and went back to leafy suburbs where they did not have to suffer from anti-social behaviour. That caused a huge row in the legal and civil liberties press. The director of Liberty, Mr. Wadham, who was involved in defending the lads from Liverpool, pointed out that he was not at all prosperous and did not live in a leafy suburb.

Mr. Coaker: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a genuine feeling that the human rights of people who have perpetrated crimes are sometimes given more importance than those of the victims, who are the majority?

Mr. Hawkins: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, but the situation is extraordinary when the director of Liberty can write to The Guardian attacking the Home Secretary. The fact that the Government are being attacked from the right and left and by their own Back Benchers shows what a mess they have got themselves into. In summary, they have got it all wrong. The legislation is not working. It must be torn up. The Government must start again or, preferably, a Conservative Government will have to come to the rescue and sort out the mess.

11.15 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Charles Clarke): I commend the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on his most entertaining contribution to the debate but, more important, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gelding (Mr. Coaker) on his outstanding speech and on introducing such an important debate. I wish to highlight four of the points that he made. They are powerful and should dominate our thoughts. First, he said that we are talking not about all young people, but about the small minority of those who are anti-social in character. Our discussion should not be thought to cast doubt on the behaviour of young people in general, a statement echoed by the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell).

Secondly, my hon. Friend rightly put at the centre of his speech the issue of intimidation. Violent, physical and mental intimidation is the core of anti-social behaviour. An entire neighbourhood can be oppressed by the activities of a small group of people. We must change the balance between the intimidator and the intimidated, and the 1998 Act was designed to achieve that aim.

Thirdly, my hon. Friend drew attention, as did Opposition Members, to the need for tougher and quicker action—a point that reverberated around the Chamber this morning. Fourthly, he referred to the vicious circle of "Not me, guv". In the past, various agencies, whether local authority housing, social services or the police, have said, "It is not my problem to sort out, it is the other one's problem." The core objective of the legislation under which ASBOs were established was to end that culture and to say that it is the responsibility of us all to work together and deal with such problems, whether strategically in the sense of crime reduction partnerships or through specific relationships with particular agencies. That is one of the reasons why I reject the suggestion of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath. Returning to a culture of zero partnership in such situations and simply leaving such matters to the police would be a retrograde step. After consideration, the hon. Gentleman may agree that such a move would be ill advised.

I commend the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), especially her emphasis on the need to establish a culture that addresses such issues more effectively. By that, she meant a culture among people in which personal relationships are based on respect and trust rather than on intimidation and fear. There must also be a culture in all the agencies of the state, whether local government or the police, that says that they are about solving such problems rather than thinking that they will go away by some means that does not involve actively addressing them.

I really have only one response to make to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath. He said that the problem was very difficult. He was right. We are talking about changing culture and behaviour patterns. We face the choice of whether to address that difficulty and try to solve it or just to sit back, say that it is too hard to deal with and leave it alone. The order filled a gap that had been left in the legisation by the previous Government. We accept that the problem is difficult, but we want to have a go at cracking it, rather than simply say that it is too hard a problem to solve.

Although it is entertaining to revisit the Committee debate—it helps parliamentarians to understand the broader context, as the hon. Gentleman intended—the Conservatives must answer a central political question. They must choose between having a go at solving the problem and deciding that it is too hard and that they cannot deal with it. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman has chosen the latter course.

Mr. St. Aubyn: The Housing Acts 1985 and 1996 contain powerful provisions to deal with the problems described by the Minister. Why have the Government not yet implemented the remand provisions of the 1996 Act?

Mr. Clarke: I shall come to that in a moment. It was a legitimate point, and I intended to commend the hon. Gentleman for raising it in his speech—but not for the other points that he made.

At the moment, we do not collect figures for the number of ASBOs in force nationally. The order was implemented on 1 April 1999, and we estimate that between 20 and 25 orders are now in force, rather than the six or 10 that were mentioned earlier. The figures are moving forward and we want to encourage that. They operate in areas as diverse as Somerset, Liverpool, Derbyshire, Worcestershire, Blackburn, Coventry, London, Suffolk, Newcastle, York, Huddersfield and Nottingham. Expertise in those areas is building up.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Colchester that his town does not feature in that list. The hon. Gentleman said that he was not against the legislation in principle. I suggest that he ought in principle to be for it, and that he should encourage his friends on Colchester council to operate it. I know that he has great influence on the council, and I hope that he will consider urging his friends to put Colchester on the list. A shift in stance from not being against the legislation to being for it might be beneficial to his constituents and to everyone in that area. It might even help the Liberal Domocrat party's electoral chances, although I have no desire for that.

To our knowledge, only two of the 20 to 25 orders have been breached. In Newcastle, a defendant was imprisoned for 28 days and breached the order again on the day of his release. He was sentenced to two months imprisonment on 27 January for that second breach. The sanction bites when ASBOs are breached. In Nottingham, not far from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling, an order was granted in December against a juvenile aged 14. The order has allegedly been breached, and the defendant is now on remand awaiting trial for that breach. I understand that the trial will take place in March.

Derbyshire was included in my list. It is worth quoting from an article published in Police Review by the officer in charge of the case in Derbyshire, Chief Inspector Royston Smith. He wrote:

"The neighbours have stated that it was a triumph of the community working together to fight off the bullies who destroyed their quality of life . . . as a result we were able to protect the civil liberties of the peaceful, law abiding majority who were at risk".

That is the view of the police officer in Derbyshire who dealt with the problem; it is a testament to the impact that the legislation can have when it is effectively applied. I congratulate the Derbyshire police force and the local authorities.

It is not only a question of successful legal action being taken. The metropolitan borough of Liverpool successfully applied for the first two orders. Over the past year, Liverpool has dealt successfully with more than 100 cases of anti-social behaviour, but only two have resulted in orders. I emphasise that although we need tough sanctions, our aim is to stop the anti-social behaviour. That is the purpose of ASBOs, so Liverpool's experience is encouraging.

Mr. Hawkins: The Minister has given us quite a lot of detail about how many orders have been imposed and where. I am slightly puzzled, because, in answer to the written questions that I cited, he said that information on the number of ASBOs granted or in progress was not held centrally. Do his answers today mean that such information is now held centrally and that we can ask further questions? If not, will be consider whether it should be?

Mr. Clarke: I think that I said—I believe that the record will sustain this—that we still do not collect evidence centrally. We do, however, collect the details as far as we can.

The hon. Gentleman has a valid point. As part of the process, which I shall explain in a moment, I am prepared to consider whether data should be collected centrally, assisting not only the House but the rolling out of the whole programme.

Several red herrings have arisen on what ASBOs might cover. The hon. Member for Colchester mentioned Conservatives, hunters and morris dancers. It is not currently our intention that ASBOs, which deal essentially with anti-social behaviour on estates, should apply to those areas. The hon. Member for Guildford mentioned Mike Tyson; as far as I know, the Home Secretary, who considered many issues to do with Mike Tyson, did not consider whether an ASBO was an effective technique for dealing with him. There has even been a suggestion that the problem of Leylandii hedges be dealt with by ASBOs—an eventuality that the Home Office was able to prevent. We are talking about the sort of intimidation and anti-social behaviour that my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling raised; that is the key aspect of the whole programme.

Several hon. Members correctly said that a wide range of measures are available. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) mentioned introductory tenancies, for example, which is an excellent idea that is being actively considered. The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley also raised the question of school exclusion orders, and parenting orders were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling. The range of options available to address the issues are under active consideration. We have not yet come to a view on the specific measures that the hon. Member for Guildford mentioned but are still discussing the best way to proceed. However, this point was legitimate and we are actively considering whether specific measures should be brought forward from the armoury of available measures. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned mediation. As a result of ASBOs, mediation has been able to work in several other specific ways.

It is critically important to develop a better use of ASBOs. That is why we have planned a series of meetings over the coming months to discuss the experience of those at the sharp end, to use the words of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath. My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling is right: we want to learn the weaknesses in the structure in order to improve it and ensure that it moves forward. We also want to develop standard protocols, so that the wheel is not continually being reinvented, and to develop proper training and guidelines. We need to do better in those regards and are committed to doing so.

I shall deal with the several specific points that were raised. First, lawyers have raised several concerns about human rights. Apart from the rhetorical point on whose human rights are really at risk—on which I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling—the Government strongly believe that there is no human rights implication in the use of ASBOs that should in any way inhibit their use. That is the legal advice we have received, and it is our considered opinion. Those who argue that there is a serious human rights issue that should inhibit the use of ASBOs are, in my view and that of the Government, wrong.

The charge that the ASBO is too complex and bureaucratic was well made. However, apart from the fact that it is a two-stage process, we do not believe that it is unduly complex. It is in two stages because that enables us to address the issue at the first stage and does not immediately criminalise people. A civil remedy is provided at the first level. However, we are prepared to look at the precise way in which it operates to consider whether it can be made more effective. On the requirement, raised by my hon. Friend, for witnesses to attend court, the ASBO is a civil order and hearsay evidence can therefore be used, under section 1(2)(a) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 which deals with someone who is "likely to cause" harassment. It is for the courts to decide whether to accept such hearsay evidence, but the Home Office view is that such evidence is acceptable, thereby circumventing the need for physical attendance at court.

It has been suggested that the burden of evidence may be too heavy. Obviously, the amount of evidence required will ultimately depend on the court and the circumstances of the case. The police are aware that evidence needs to be proved only on a balance of probabilities. That is an important consideration. It is clearly in the interests of victims of anti-social behaviour for good quality evidence—

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. We must now move to the next debate.

Magistrates Courts (Devon)

11.30 am

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): It is good to see you in the Chair, Mr. Jones, and I am delighted that you will be presiding. I initiate the debate today because of the terrifying effect that may result from the Lord Chancellor's wish to save money by closing magistrates courts throughout the country, and especially in Devon and Cornwall. Lay magistrates, supported by justices' clerks, are best placed to provide local justice in courts throughout the country. However, judicial functions are increasingly being compromised by administrative expediency and financial cuts. That is unacceptable to the public, court users and the cause of justice.

Magistrates courts are managed by locally based magistrates courts committees of local magistrates selected by a selection panel of local magistrates. The committees act under the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994 and the Justices of the Peace Act 1997.

The Devon and Cornwall magistrates courts committee is responsible for the proper and efficient operation of courts in Devon. It must determine not only the overall operation of justice but how many courthouses are necessary and what other accommodation, urban and rural, is required. In so doing, it acts in consultation with the relevant authority that makes money available for that work—in this case, Devon county council. The committee must operate within "the guidelines"—the diktat—of the Lord Chancellor's Department, which is trying to save the Government money.

The Lord Chancellor is obviously out of touch. When I complained about the centralisation of the youth court, which is to be removed from Axminster and sent to Exeter, he wrote:

> "The magistrates Court Committee has no proposals to close Axminster or any court house in Devon and Cornwall."

Hon. Members might assume that that was written months or even years ago. The Parliamentary Secretary will probably have been supplied with the letter. On 22 November last year the Lord Chancellor was trying to fob off Members of Parliament in that way, when he must have known that his instructions to the magistrates courts committee would effect such closures. It is equally interesting that only last week the Parliamentary Secretary said in this very Chamber:

> "The essential feature of local justice is that magistrates live or work in the locality."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 25 January 2000; Vol. 343, c. 34WH.]

The current approach of saving money through the Lord Chancellor's edict will result in exactly the opposite.

Closing the magistrates court at Axminster, which would require people who have been charged to appear in Exeter, is similar to closing a magistrates court in West Ealing and making people go to a court in Reading. That would be mad, and it is equally mad to expect those in the Axminster area to travel to Exeter for justice. What I am saying is not a foolish assumption—it has already happened. The youth court previously in Axminster has been transferred to and centralised in Exeter.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): As usual, the right hon. Gentleman makes a powerful speech. He knows Devon and Cornwall well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and knows that there are countless such examples. Does he agree that it is ludicrous even to suggest that people from Okehampton should travel to Barnstaple for those purposes, and that the proposals are short sighted, unlikely to provide any savings and inimical to access to justice?

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. I should tell hon. Members that the House has ordered that people such as me should be addressed by name, not as Mr. Deputy Speaker. My name is Mr. Jones.

Sir Peter Emery: So far as "local" is concerned, I shall quote from a letter from a well-known solicitor in my constituency, Mr. Colin Chesterton. He wrote to me after seeing the Lord Chancellor's letter in November and said:

"What we now have is the worst of all worlds, with cases being heard in the wrong place for the wrong reason. To describe Devon Magistrates Courts as 'locally managed' is a bizarre use of the word local. Devon and Cornwall is a 'region'. It is worth remembering that Axminster is equidistant from Penzance as it is from London. I take it that it is not proposed that somebody from Axminster should have a say in whether South London Magistrates Courts should do Youth Courts work. I am sure that those in the Lord Chancellor's Department are very clever, but geography is not their strongest suit. They could also brush up on their English and the use of the word 'local'. Unless of course they think we can be fobbed off with platitudes about what is really local decision making."

Let me come to the major worry. The magistrates courts committee has proposed that 10 of the 17 courts in Devon should be closed. Those are: Axminster, Exmouth, Kingsbridge, South Molton, Tavistock, Teignmouth, Tiverton, Bideford, Okehampton and Newton Abbot. Exmouth, the second-largest town in the county of Devon, is to have its court closed. Does that really make sense to its population? It is a tragedy for local people and is typical of the Government's lack of attention to the requirements of the countryside.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): As my right hon. Friend is aware, the problems that he referred to are happening throughout the country. Does he share my concern that we are seeing an enormous centralising tendency in which everything local is subsumed to the diktats of the Treasury?

Sir Peter Emery: It is really a tragedy. In the long term, we will see local magistrates being taken over by stipendiary magistrates as part of the centralisation.

One of the major factors understood by everyone with experience of magistrates courts is that local magistrates know the people in their locality. They are most likely to know the local rogues and malcontents, and transferring them to centres a considerable distance away from their locality will soon mean that that important local aspect of justice is lost. To expect justices of the peace sitting in Exeter to have the knowledge of the local justice of the peace sitting in Axminster is nonsense. What is more, it is likely that people living 30 miles from the court will think twice before taking on the responsibility of becoming a local magistrate. Local people will not come forward.

I turn to the problem of getting respondents to a court many miles from their home. In an urban area, one can jump on a bus, or in London one can take the tube. There are no tubes in Devon or Cornwall, and the bus services in many country districts are so infrequent that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for some people to get to court by 10 am. People living in Beer, Branscombe and Seaton have a limited bus service, and would have to take the bus to Axminster and the train to Exeter. That is immensely time consuming and incurs considerable cost. Moreover, as one of my solicitors pointed out, they may not be able to get back home that night, which would mean finding a bed in Exeter.

Will the Minister tell us how much the Lord Chancellor's Department is trying to save by these amalgamations? I have heard that it is £225 million. I do not know if that is correct, but I would like a figure to be given to us in the debate. Even if the figure is that high, is it not well worth the Government's while to spend such an amount to ensure local justice?

May I analyse some of the effects of the closures of local magistrates courts? I take Axminster as an example because I know it well, and because it is illustrative of the other towns to which I have referred. Once Axminster court closes, it will lose its county court and its tax commissioners hearings, and we shall no longer have coroners' inquests. The probation service will have no office in which to meet its clients on neutral ground anywhere nearer than Exmouth, which could be difficult for female probation officers dealing with male sex offenders. That will be made worse by the announcement that the Exmouth court is to close, so the probation service in Exmouth will have to move to Exeter as well.

Local papers will be unlikely to report petty crimes, as they would if they were dealt with locally, because they will be dealt with in the two major courts in Exeter, with each court often handling 50 cases a day. Local papers will probably report only serious crimes, which is not much help to the elderly who are worried about crime. They would see papers carrying only stories about rape, murder and so on, instead of run-of-the-mill cases such as shoplifting and motor offences.

The Devon and Cornwall constabulary has confirmed that Axminster police station is to close. At the moment, we have a courthouse. Costs of about £7,000 will be incurred to make it comply with disability requirements. East Devon district council, realising the need to keep the local court, has offered to pay half that amount, even though there is no obligation for it to do so. If the courthouse is to disappear, the capital cost of any future replacement would be such as to make its reconstitution unlikely. It is interesting to note that the capital cost of the courthouse was written off many years ago.

I am worried that there has been no proper cost benefit analysis of the closure of this court. The Government do not know how human rights legislation will affect the operation of local courts. Perhaps the Minister will enlighten us on that? I am told that it will increase the work load in magistrates courts. It is nonsense to have the wholesale closures of courts and the loss of their existing facilities, if their work is to be expanded.

I return to the question of getting people to court. I have checked the following times this morning to ensure that they are correct. The people now served by the Axminster court in the villages of Hawkchurch, Dalwood, Branscombe, Chardstock and Membury have buses only once a week—Tuesdays or Thursdays—at only one time, which varies from 1.35 pm, 10.30 am, 12.45 pm, 9.10 am and 10.30 am. I suppose that the Government do not have to consider people living in those areas.

That is a major error of judgment by the Lord Chancellor, who should know better. He is there to defend justice, not to attack it. Undermining local justice to save a relatively small amount of money is a threat to local society, completely misunderstands the problem of those who live in and around the countryside. The Government should know better.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair this morning, Mr. Jones. It is the first time that I have been required to answer a debate such as this in my capacity as Parliamentary Secretary. I look forward to returning on future occasions, as I am sure that hon. Members will return to this subject.

Last week, I congratulated the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) on securing a debate on similar issues. I now congratulate the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) on securing this debate and allowing us to return to these matters. He has demonstrated the importance of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman made a most interesting speech, making many serious points well, expressing his constituents' concerns and demonstrating the local strength of feeling about this matter. It may help if I set out the current position in Devon and Cornwall.

Devon and Cornwall magistrates courts committee, which came into existence on 1 April 1999, undertook a review of all aspects of the service to decide how best to fulfil its statutory duty. As I said last week, it is sensible and rational for these reviews to take place, and the Government expect no less of committees discharging their responsibilities. In conducting reviews, committees must have regard to the level of service that they seek to provide across the area as a whole. They cannot look at any one part of their area in isolation.

The committee has begun a consultation exercise on its proposals to develop the service over the next five years. The consultation period does not close until 7 April. The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate from previous debates that at this stage any matters in connection with the proposals are for the Devon and Cornwall magistrates courts committee to address.

Mr. Burnett: Will the Minister tell the House whether there are any instructions from her Department, as alluded to by the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery), in relation to cost savings or overall budgets for Devon and Cornwall?

Jane Kennedy: Having anticipated that those issues might be raised, I shall come to them shortly.

As I was saying, these are only proposals: the end result will not necessarily be the closure of 13 courts. The courts committee will carefully consider the results of its consultation exercise on 13 April, when it next meets.

The Government already encourage courts committees to extend their consultation processes wider than is required by section 56(1) of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. They usually consult more widely than only among their paying authorities. Consultees typically include magistrates, the staff, the police, the probation service, the Crown Prosecution Service, Members of Parliament and professional users of the courts. Devon and Cornwall magistrates courts committee consults far more widely than the statutory minimum.

If a magistrates courts committee makes a determination to close a courthouse, the paying authority has the sole right of appeal to the Lord Chancellor against the proposed closure. I assure hon. Members that we give detailed consideration to the case that is presented when an appeal is made, and we shall do in this case, should the paying authorities appeal.

Sir Peter Emery: Is the Minister saying that the Government will make available to the local magistrates courts committee the same amount of money that it has had in the past, and that it therefore does not have to close anything because it has the necessary money? Surely closures occur because the committees do not have the funds.

Jane Kennedy: Proposals to change the way in which courtrooms are distributed are not normally cost driven, but are informed by the requirement of the magistrates courts committees to provide modern court services that meet the needs of court users. I shall come to that issue in a few minutes. I shall keep my eye on the clock so that I make sure that I respond to the points that the right hon. Gentleman has raised.

All the points made by local representation, the paying authority and hon. Members are listened to carefully. Travelling time, cost, convenience and accessibility to the courts are points frequently raised with the Department. Right hon. and hon. Members will be heartened to learn that not all appeals are dismissed by the Lord Chancellor.

The right hon. Gentleman raised the issue of statutory responsibility, which, as he said, is set out in the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. No instructions from the Lord Chancellor order that a court should proceed along a certain route, or that decisions should be driven by cost. I hope that I have reassured the right hon. Gentleman on that point. As I said last week, when he was present, magistrates courts committees are made up of local magistrates, selected by a local panel. We must remember that "local" means different things to different people: for some it means the town, for others the village and for others the magistrates courts committee area.

I want to spend a moment describing the functions of the magistrates courts committees and those elected to serve on them, so that hon. Members are aware of their responsibilities. The changes enacted by the previous Government were designed to make the committees more effective as management boards and to extend the range of skills available. The Government did not envisage individual benches of magistrates no longer having a say in the management of the courts in their area, but saw individual members being selected on the basis of the skills and abilities that they could bring to the area as a whole. The committee's function can best be summed up by repeating what Lord McIntosh of Haringey said during the passage of the Access to Justice Bill:

"The committee is there to decide strategy and set standards and to monitor and be accountable for implementation and achievement.—[Official Report, House of Lords, 28 January 1999; Vol. 596, c. 1265.]

One way in which to modernise and improve the service would be to transfer the work load to better equipped centres. Local magistrates who form courts committees have local knowledge, and are best placed to decide how to make the best use of all their resources. Only when a decision is challenged by the paying authority does the Lord Chancellor become involved. The Government believe that those arrangements are working well and that committees are comprised of those who can best serve the needs of the area as a whole. It would not be consistent with our aim to modernise the service if we were to return, as has been suggested, to a system of geographical representation that may serve the interests of individual benches rather than the magistrates courts overall.

It is crucial that the committee should be able to plan strategically for the whole of its area. I can only reiterate that it is entirely for local magistrates courts to make any decisions on the number and location of courthouses, in consultation with the relevant paying authorities—in this case, Cornwall county council, which is the lead authority, Devon county council, Torbay unitary council, Plymouth unitary council and the Council of the Isles of Scilly.

Those matters lie solely within the responsibility of local magistrates courts committees. When resources are tight, it is up to the local committee to manage within available resources. However, the central council of magistrates courts committees has produced a good practice guide on the subject of court closures, and the Government encourage magistrates courts committees to follow that advice.

I turn to funding. I am sure that hon. Members are aware that the Government provide 80 per cent. of the revenue grant to magistrates courts committees and local authorities contribute 20 per cent. Individual committees are given an annual allocation, but it is left to each committee to determine how best to use the funds to provide services, including courthouses in each area.

I was asked last week about the funding formula. We are reviewing the mechanism for allocating grant to magistrates courts committees. One of the issues that is being considered is whether there should be a sparsity factor to reflect higher costs associated with providing services in generally rural areas. We expect to finalise that review in time for the financial year 2001–02.

The right hon. Member for East Devon asked about amalgamations. In the long term, it is reckoned that amalgamations will save 6 per cent. of the budget of a magistrates courts committee overall. Consultants were commissioned by the previous Government to look into proposed amalgamations at Birmingham, Coventry and Solihull. Efficiency savings are not just cost savings. They include improvements in the court service delivered to court users, as I discussed at length last week.

Dealing with Devon alone, prior to the amalgamation with Cornwall, in cash terms the total revenue resources available increased by £220,000 in the four years to 1998–99. We are not discussing an issue that is being driven by costs and cost savings. We are discussing issues that the magistrates courts committees must decide, bearing in mind their local information and experience, and bringing that to bear on the services that they provide to the court users and to the delivery of justice in their locality.

Sir Peter Emery: The Minister is being most helpful and I know that she is trying to assist me, but I shall come to the nub of the matter. Will the Devon committee receive this year the same amount in the 80 per cent. that comes from the Government as it received last year, although presumably with a 3 per cent. increase for inflation?

Jane Kennedy: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to write to him in reply to that question, because I do not want to mislead him.

Mr. Burnett: Will the Minister also extrapolate the projections for the two following years and send me a copy of the letter?

Jane Kennedy: I shall be happy to send the hon. Gentleman a copy of my letter to the right hon. Member for East Devon.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me about the Human Rights Act 1998 and I have only a few minutes left. He will be pleased to learn that the Government are considering the whole question of ensuring that magistrates courts premises provide, as far as possible, facilities that are compatible with the European convention on human rights. I do not anticipate any closures resulting directly from implementation of the 1998 Act on 2 October this year. However, magistrates courts committees may need to apply a higher threshold than now when considering, for example, the standard of custody, interview and witness facilities that are required in courthouses. When the viability of rural courts houses is assessed, many factors need to be taken into account, including the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998. Our overriding concern must be to provide facilities that can deliver the required service at an acceptable standard. We must take a pragmatic—

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

12 noon

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I am glad to have this opportunity to discuss best practice in the ambulance service, which has an excellent record in Staffordshire, where my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) are located. I also speak as someone who avidly watches "Casualty" every Saturday night.

A "Panorama" investigation that was broadcast on 17 January raised important questions about training, the pre-emergency hospital care that is available throughout the country and the management of the national health service ambulance service. That programme, which was criticised for concentrating on six incidents that I shall not discuss, shed a spotlight on wider issues, including the differences in ambulance services and training and response times between regions. I hope that we can discuss those matters constructively. The Government need to consider their response to the disparities in standards and performance that the "Panorama" programme highlighted.

I want to put Staffordshire's record straight and to discuss with the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), whether Britain can benefit from my county's best practice and what best practice should be applied throughout the country. Ministers recognised in paraliamentary answers that were given to me in February 1998 and to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands in July 1998 that the Staffordshire ambulance service is a beacon. My county's approach should be in the main stream. My county's performance could help the Government to develop new standards.

Service provision in Staffordshire will be subject to an independent audit by the Sheffield university medical care research unit. We shall know, when that audit is published, whether the practice in Staffordshire could help to influence ambulance service provision. When we need an ambulance, it is important that we get it quickly and that it has a suitably qualified and experienced crew. I pay tribute to the work of paramedics and ambulance service crews across the country. We must ensure that they receive appropriate training and management and that they have career prospects that will help them to deliver the services that the public want.

What scope is there for ensuring greater standardisation of best practice? I want to ensure that there is a higher minimum standard; I do not want to stifle local variations and regional differences, which contribute to the overall performance of the ambulance service. That higher minimum standard would ensure that regional disparities were better understood and resourced and that all services were levelled upwards. Paramedics are about to become a state-registered profession run by a board that will operate under the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine. What progress—I ask this in a spirit of constructive criticism—has been made in that regard? Will the new way of organising paramedics in the ambulance service contain sufficient powers to ensure that they can do the job that the public expect them to do?

I turn to the training of paramedics. I do not doubt their commitment and dedication, but do we offer enough? For example, compared to the training offered by other countries, or that offered to military technicians in our defence services, we could perhaps offer more. The standard of paramedic training in the United Kingdom is far below that required for emergency medical technicians and paramedics in the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. We must consider best practice not only across the country but internationally.

We must also consider national funding, and the structures and mechanisms that are needed to improve training. How is that process being reviewed? I am slightly worried by research conducted at Sheffield university, which suggests that there is a detrimental variation in treatment offered by ambulance crews.

Should not greater attention be given to various clinical protocols throughout the country? On the "Panorama" programme, Barry John, who is chairman of the Ambulance Service Association, admitted that some services do not use best practice at the moment. We must ensure that the association is able to achieve best practice.

Some counties authorise certain life-saving drugs and others do not. Paramedics in some counties are trained in life-saving techniques and others are not. Is there any longer an excuse for such variations? In the light of the fact that three counties that have different protocols have merged to form an east midlands trust, the time has come for a national minimum standard.

Does the Minister agree that now is the time to rethink the new targets that will be linked to core prioritisation by April 2001? I recognise that progress has been made, but core prioritisation studies and the achievements revealed by Department of Health statistics make it clear that not all pilot projects have met the new national standards. New priority dispatch ambulance performance standards have been adopted. The aim is that 75 per cent. of category A calls—emergencies—will be responded to within 8 minutes, and 95 per cent. of all other calls will be responded to within 14 minutes. However, in adopting those standards and targets, are we not going backwards? Only Staffordshire ambulance trust has met them.

We should examine best practice and assess whether it can be applied elsewhere. We should consider implementing a system of modelling that has helped to identify peak demand areas and plan staff deployment, thereby providing better standards across the country. We should learn lessons from that, and from the target response times that have consistently been met during the past four years. I am worried that we are adopting a two-tier response system. Two out of eight pilot ambulance services have been unable to meet their targets. Time must be taken to assess that problem before further progress can be made.

During the time remaining, I shall focus on achievements in Staffordshire. Of course, we have wonderful crews and paramedics, a good working relationship with Staffordshire's Members of Parliament, input from trade unions and an enormous amount of community liaison work taking place every day throughout the country. I refer particularly to the 40 automated exterior defibrillators that we have in Staffordshire, and I support The Observer campaign for more defibrillators and put in a request for at least two more in north Staffordshire.

Under the Staffordshire partnership, about 1,000 pupils every year are trained in first aid by the ambulance trust. The lunchtime for lifeline programme offers training in first aid for those in industry and other workplaces. Above all, Staffordshire's records and response times far exceed those of anywhere else in the country and if we can achieve them, why cannot other places do so?

I pay tribute to the work that has been done to win Staffordshire a beacon award. The award is a standard of excellence for the retirement and retention scheme, which enables those ambulance workers who cannot continue working full-time to return, but to work different hours. That is an example of good personnel work. I also congratulate the Staffordshire ambulance service on winning a charter mark award for providing quality services.

All those factors can be linked to the modernisation programme that the new Labour Government want to put into place. I would be the first to accept that we cannot always get it right. Certainly, Staffordshire has had problems with the health authority's specification for its patient transport service, and it has proved difficult to meet response time targets. However, the new system that Staffordshire is modelling would benefit the rest of the country. I would like to see much closer links between hospitals and general practitioners and GP trusts. If a new category of beacon award is wanted, the North Staffordshire hospital trust primary group, which is seeking trust status, could act as a pilot scheme.

The time is now right to take stock and scrutinise. Above all, it is time to involve the professionals, the managers and the unions, who work so hard for the ambulance service. I invite my hon. Friend the Minister to visit Staffordshire. We have been visited by ambulance service personnel and Ministers from all around the world, most recently from New South Wales. I would be very happy if a member of the new Labour Government could visit Staffordshire and discuss those matters in detail with Staffordshire's Members of Parliament.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing this important debate, and thank her for allowing me a little share of it. As my hon. Friend said, Staffordshire ambulance service has achieved outstanding results. What surprised me about the "Panorama" programme was the reluctance of the service nationally to explore the reasons for Staffordshire's success. It is no surprise to Staffordshire's Members of Parliament, but it must be incomprehensible to many others.

The changes in Staffordshire were brought about with considerable angst. Inevitably, staff were reluctant to be thrown out of their comfortable ambulance stations, but the results speak for themselves. Ultimately, all ambulance staff want to perform at their best. They are professionals who want to see a job well done.

We have a national health service that has national standards and national training courses. Why do we not have a national ambulance service? As we saw on "Panorama", different ambulance services make different drugs available. Each service purchases its own ambulances. That purchasing policy produces no economies of scale, and some services have made bad mistakes. There seems to be little exchange of ideas when it comes to choosing the right vehicles for such an essential job.

As my hon. Friend suggested, the most significant factor for patients is the absence of nationally funded training. Each ambulance trust has to fund its own training. Staff have to pay back their training costs to the trust if they leave the job. I cannot imagine nurses having to pay back the costs of their training when they find new posts at other hospitals. That might not be a problem if, as the "Panorama" programme suggested, training for paramedics lasted only six weeks, but it does not. Initially, basic grade ambulance technicians have six weeks' training, after which they work with an experienced person for one year. The technicians are then tested on their confidence and undertake practical and written tests. After a further two years, all prospective paramedics must pass a stringent examination before being accepted for training. Only then do they undertake six weeks' introductory training. They have also to undergo a series of study days during the following year.

Prospective paramedics are accepted as qualified paramedics only when they pass written and practical examinations. They are tested by consultants in hospitals. They must then undertake regular refresher courses. Training is rightly an important part of the ambulance service, because lives are at stake. Because trusts have to fund their own training budgets, training inevitably becomes squeezed. I have received complaints that ambulance staff have had problems being accepted on paramedic courses.

Ambulance services provide additional facilities. Because of its rural nature, Staffordshire, particularly my constituency of Moorlands, developed the first responder scheme. Trained volunteers are on call to provide initial support and assurance to people within their own communities before the ambulance arrives. That can be vital in isolated rural areas, especially in the winter when it can be extremely difficult to reach houses and farms. Such services must rely on the generosity of local vehicle dealers to provide suitable transport. Since 1991, Staffordshire has had an air ambulance service, which can ensure that patients arrive at the north Staffordshire trauma centre quickly enough to have a real chance of survival and a speedy recovery. However, that service is having to raise £120,000 just to build a new helipad outside the accident and emergency department. For it to operate, it needs sponsorship on a daily basis. As we enter the 21st century, is that the right way forward for a modern ambulance service? I think not. I should be grateful to receive my hon. Friend's response.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing the debate today, not least because she has had a longstanding interest in the performance of her local ambulance trust. I understand that she met my predecessor in 1998 together with the chief executive of the trust. She raised several issues, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins), referring to the "Panorama" programme, the training of staff and regional variations. Lessons are being learned from what is happening in Staffordshire. I shall come on to core prioritisation and explain how it will not create a two-tier system, but allow us to prioritise. I agreed some time ago to visit my hon. Friend's constituency in Staffordshire and I shall be delighted to see what is happening there for myself.

Today's debate is very appropriate, because the ambulance service is at the cutting edge of the patients' experience in what are often life-threatening circumstances. The Government's commitment to a fair, fast and efficient service will be tested to its limits. We must consider what is happening to ambulance services in the context of the whole modernisation programme, which also covers NHS Direct and what is being done in accident and emergency departments to enable patients to receive a seamless service.

Training standards are important. The public expect a prompt response by skilled assistants when they call an ambulance in emergencies or life-threatening situations. That applies whether the response is from a conventional two-man ambulance or a lone paramedic in a fast-response vehicle.

It is also important to recognise that for some patients, particularly in cases of coronary heart disease or a stroke, the clinically based eight-minute recommended response time—Staffordshire is currently the only trust that meets the target—is extremely significant for recovery and long-term prospects. For that reason, we are keen to encourage every ambulance trust in the country to examine its practices. Such systems as Staffordshire's first responder scheme are also particularly helpful in rural areas.

I spent last Friday in an ambulance because I thought that I should know what I am talking about. That experience brought home to me how challenging the eight-minute response is. However, it is not just about making a rapid initial response; we also need trained control room staff and facilities so that vital advice can be given to the crew as they deal with the patient from arrival and during the journey to hospital. The evidence on what should and should not be done in the pre-hospital phase of an emergency is significantly lacking. That is a major obstacle that must be recognised. However, we have put into place clinical audits and research to devise the best model for the patient.

The Government modernisation agenda is based on improving our standards and service delivery on the basis of clinical evidence. That is also our approach to the ambulance service.

Ms Walley: As we are about to start the next round of the comprehensive spending review and the modernisation programme for the NHS is such an important part of that, does my hon. Friend agree that we should press the Chancellor to ensure that ambulances feature significantly in the NHS modernisation programme, with ring-fenced money to enable them to play their part in the integrated whole of the NHS that we know and love?

Ms Stuart: We all know that the comprehensive spending review and manager negotiations are complicated and tricky, but I assure my hon. Friend that, as part of my ministerial responsiblity, I will fight my corner as best I can.

Having looked at the general concepts, I turn to the example of Staffordshire. Ministers have frequently been accused of ignoring Staffordshire. That is far from the case. Not only is research being conducted by Sheffield to consider Staffordshire in its regular visits, but some of the lessons that we have learnt from Staffordshire are already being implemented. However, it is important that we have a clear picture of why things work in Staffordshire and, more to the point, of what can be transferred. I was interested to read this morning's parliamentary briefing from the NHS Confederation, which largely welcomes what we are doing. It states:

> "It is important not to assume that good practice can necessarily be transferred without adaptation from one location to another. We must therefore be quite clear where Staffordshire is succeeding."

I emphasise that Staffordshire has been at the cutting edge in technological development and has generously shared its experience with other services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North mentioned targets. The current target is to respond to 75 per cent. of category A—immediately life-threatening—calls within eight minutes. Staffordshire has shown significant improvement in its handling of such cases, which has resulted in improved patient outcomes. Some of Staffordshire's radical and innovative measures have benefited the local population. That should be recognised.

Staffordshire and others are implementing more efficient services in several areas. One is improved dynamic location practices. I am sure that many of us have sometimes seen an ambulance waiting in a lay-by and wondered what it is doing. It is there deliberately—as part of a system of predicting demand patterns. Extremely successful statistical models are in use, so in Staffordshire ambulances stand by at the best locations in relation to expected demand patterns. Something similar is the case for improved relief levels. Having staff on call so that they can be brought in to meet unexpected peaks in demand has been effective, but is extremely demanding on the staff. There is a danger that they feel that they are on call for 24 hours.

Much the same applies to improved activation times, which require better control room procedures, preparation of crews and ambulance availability. All that cuts vital seconds in those essential fast response times. There must also be improvements in the matching of resources to demand, which means flexible rostering to ensure that the shifts match expected demand levels. It is only sensible to use the staff available most efficiently.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North fears that core prioritisation may lead to a two-tier system. We must recognise the great variation in the kind of calls that ambulance crews receive in a day. Any system must ensure that the most urgent calls—those when response is clearly critical within eight minutes—receive the first priority. Some calls—those in category C, for example—allow huge scope for NHS Direct to use a second stage of triaging to assess appropriate response levels. I assure my hon. Friend that core prioritisation is not a means by which we intend to create a two-tier system, but simply a means to ensure that the response is appropriate to the need.

We shall have the report on the research in Staffordshire by the end of the month, and it is important that we learn from it. I would like to make a couple of brief remarks about state registration and training. My hon. Friend wanted to know about the board, which I understand met for the first time yesterday. We are delighted that is up and running. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands is right to believe that "Panorama" misrepresented the amount of training involved. Comparisons have been made with America, but gunshots and stabbings, which are common critical injuries in that country, require different kinds of response.

I would like to ensure that we all leave the debate with a recognition that ambulance facilities are part of our emergency service. The development of NHS Direct, ambulance facilities and accident and emergency facilities will provide important services. The failure of the vast majority of ambulance trusts to meet some response targets requires us to consider closely how we deliver the service. A patient needs a speedy response from the right people and to be taken to the right hospital at the right time. Staffordshire is giving us a good lead on how we should develop that.

Similarly, we will ensure that patient care is improved by considering how staff are used while the patient is in transit. We shall introduce state registration for paramedics and ensure that the people who respond to calls are appropriately trained and continue to be trained. We should also recognise what a difficult job those in the ambulance services have—a job in which demand is continually increasing. They make life-and-death decisions 24 hours a day, 365 days a year and have had responded to around 3 million calls in the past year. However, there is no room for complacency. We must consider the needs of rural and urban areas, and above all ensure that we respond in time when clinical conditions are the relevant indicators, especially for an eight-minute response time.

Pig Industry

12.30 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate an Adjournment debate on the crisis in the pig industry. This is my debut appearance in this Chamber. Today's debate is especially timely, because it coincides with the National Farmers Union annual conference. Pig farms face unprecedented hard times and a complete lack of sympathy and understanding of the crisis in the countryside from the Government. That was displayed most recently by the Prime Minister this weekend, although he was, perhaps, slightly more sympathetic in his speech at the conference today. I invite the Prime Minister, as part of his tour of the countryside, to visit the Vale of York, meet local pig producers and witness their plight for himself. A glimpse of the reality in North Yorkshire would quickly change his tune.

The British pig industry is the innocent victim of the bovine spongiform encephalopathy regime. Simply removing meat and bonemeal articles from the animal food chain adds a cost of more than £5 per pig. Prices in the United Kingdom are depressed, as the Prime Minister today recognised. We face cheaper imports and a strong pound. The Government have failed to pay agrimonetary compensation for the high pound and the weak euro.

In addition, on 1 January, the UK unilaterally imposed a sow stall-and-tether ban. All other European Union countries, including our main competitors, Denmark and Holland, will face the ban only six years hence, on 1 January 2006. The cost to the UK producer of that one measure alone is estimated to be £220 million. That is unfair, and puts UK producers at a competitive disadvantage, as Dutch, Danish, Belgian, French and German producers are not expected to comply.

As a result, pound for pound and kilo for euro, British pork prices will increase, and the price of continental competitive imports will be reduced. Those disadvantages are aggravated by the increasingly strong pound and the crippling additional costs of implementing the European Union integrated pollution prevention and control directive, which will have a singularly negative impact on the UK pig industry. Early conservative estimates suggest an initial start-up cost of £18,000 a farm, and annual running costs thereafter of £6,000, equating to £1,200 a day, which will add an extra £2.50 to the production of each pig in this country. The annual cost of implementing the integrated pollution prevention and control directive in this country alone is estimated to be £13 million.

A three-pronged attack is the very least that the Government should consider. A one-off Treasury grant should be made to pig producers in order to restructure the pig sector—not to subsidise pig farmers' incomes, which is strictly forbidden under EU competition rules. The Prime Minister invites pig producers to diversify, but how can they afford to do so in the present crisis? They merely want a Treasury grant on a strictly comparable basis to those provided in other EU countries, such as the Belgian national aid provided to restructure the market in the wake of the dioxin scandal.

The aid scheme that pig farmers envisage would offset the cost of BSE-related measures that have been imposed on the pig industry on public health grounds. There was a general belief, which the Government encouraged, that the Commission received such a package from the Government last year. I received a letter from the European Commission dated 11 November last year, formally notifying me that no such package had been received. A gentleman whom I am sure the Minister knows extremely well, Mr. Legras, the director general for agriculture, wrote:

"The services of the Commission are aware"— perhaps more aware than the Government—

"of the difficulties confronting the pig sector in the UK and informal contacts have taken place between my staff and the British authorities to discuss what form an aid might take. At the present time, however, we have not received from the UK any formal notification of proposals to grant aid.

In order to be acceptable any aid must of course meet the conditions laid down by the Treaty. In particular, the aid should facilitate the economic development of the sector. Aids which are simply intended to offset trading losses are in principle not acceptable under the Community rules."

There has been some movement today. BBC News Online states that the Prime Minister said in a speech to the National Farmers Union conference this morning that he "did not rule out the possibility of cash help for the beleaguered pig industry" and was "prepared to listen to ideas."

However, he went on to say that

"while investment could help, it had to be tied to long-term change and reform."

Commissioner Franz Fischler, in correspondence with pig farmers nationally, had indicated that such a package would be favourably viewed, provided it did not cause distortion to the market. In his letter of 9 December 1999, he set out the acceptability of state aid being granted to compensate British pig producers for higher production costs for pigmeat resulting from restrictions on disposal of offal. In the past, such aid from the UK to pig farmers was authorised by the Commission under article 87(2)(b) of the treaty, as an exceptional occurrence intended to make good the damage caused by the BSE crisis. If the Government are to reintroduce such aid, they must prove that the losses that are being incurred by UK pig producers are the direct result of an exceptional occurrence recognised by the Commission, and are not due to other factors.

I am dwelling on the matter in some depth because I was a trainee in the Commission's competition directorate, and perhaps more familiar with the terminology than are many hon. Members. In his letter of 9 December, Commissioner Fischler set out an alternative head of aid. He stated that aid to facilitate development of the pig sector must be justified under article 87(3)(c) of the treaty—that is, to help to restructure the industry to meet changed market conditions.

There seems to be some convergence between the Prime Minister's hopes and aspirations for pig farmers and the requests that pig farmers wish to submit to the Government. I fully accept that aid that is simply intended to offset current trading losses is unacceptable. Given the exceptional circumstances that those in the pig industry have endured for at least the past six months, I make a plea to the Minister—and, through her, to the Prime Minister—to demonstrate the Government's big heart by making a one-off payment to the industry, subject to the European Commission approval that I outlined. That would enable pig farmers to deal with the unprecedented and uncompetitive conditions that they face, satisfy EU criteria and give pig farmers a means of earning their living, now and in future.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: I welcome the support of the hon. Gentleman, and that of other hon. Members who are here, but unfortunately he did not advise me or the Minister that he wished to intervene.

Will the Government be big-hearted and brave-hearted enough to show an understanding of the crisis and of the despair in the countryside? That would be very welcome in the Vale of York and elsewhere. Today, the Prime Minister invited farmers to diversify, but they simply do not have the funds to do so.

Today's speech by the Prime Minister suggested that there may be some movement in favour of positive animal welfare-friendly labelling. That was welcome. If pork is imported and processed here, the label should say so. Marking the country of origin of pork would assist consumers in choosing which meat to buy. If it does not meet this country's stringent animal welfare criteria, the label should say so, and consumers should be allowed to decide for themselves. Cheaper pork of inferior quality, which is produced under less humane conditions that do not meet our animal welfare specifications, could be introduced.

Working within the parameters of agenda 2000 and the new objective 2 funding I accept that objective 5b status has gone. The possibilities of rural development funds will apply increasingly in the future. North Yorkshire qualifies for a generous allocation of new objective 2 funding. I hope that all hon. Members can work together to ensure that objective 2 benefits North Yorkshire and other regions that have been badly affected by problems in the pig sector. I hope that consideration will be given to certain aspects of rural development policy, and especially to areas threatened by abandonment. I hope that we make an imaginative application of the limited funds available.

I shall now conclude to allow other hon. Members to speak before the Minister's reply. I urge the Minister to agree that there is a crisis in the countryside, and nowhere more visibly than in the pig sector. I invite the Minister to work closely with the pig industry to agree a one-off grant of assistance with the approval of the European Commission. That is not a novel idea; it was successfully pursued by the Irish Government in June 1998, the Belgian Government in July 1999, and the

[Miss McIntosh]

French Government, who submitted a £17 million application this year. Farmers in the Vale of York have been heavily involved in the application to the Government, and I would like to pay tribute to Stewart Houston, who farms at Thornborough in Bedale. He said:

"The industry believes we can put forward a scheme for support which is legal and operable and which Brussels would support."

I therefore urge the Government, and the Minister, to save our pig industry and show their human face in recognising the plight of the countryside in general, and of pig farmers in particular.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Ms Joyce Quin): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on securing this debate on an important subject. She referred to the importance of the industry to her constituency and to her part of the world, of which I am well aware. That is because I have visited the area on a number of occasions, and because of the way in which she and other hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, have raised these issues in recent weeks and months. I am also aware not only of the number of pig farmers in her area but of the related pig processing industries and of the work involved in delivering pigmeat and pork products to our supermarkets.

I share the hon. Lady's concern about the pig industry and I hope that, on some points at least, I can respond in a positive manner. I believe that the Government have done a great deal in recent weeks and months to address concerns in the pig industry, although it is true that some of the ideas that have been put forward are difficult to implement. The hon. Lady and I will be especially aware of the reason for that, as we have both been Members of the European Parliament and know the European Commission and the European system. Some of the constraints in agricultural sectors do not receive high levels of intervention and market support. The pig industry, of course, does not come under such provisions. The hon. Lady also referred to certain significant events, especially the annual conference of the National Farmers Union, in London, and the Prime Minister's speech to the NFU this morning.

The pig sector is in serious difficulties; there is no way of disguising that. It is acknowledged by hon. Members on both sides. Although the industry has had to contend with peaks and troughs on many occasions in the past—the cycle of the pig industry is well known—the current crisis is deeper and we must take certain special factors into account.

Miss McIntosh: As the Minister said, pigmeat is not a supported sector in the European Union. Would it not be appropriate for the Government to look kindly on the provision of one-off aid? Most of the cost to the pig industry has been imposed by the ban on sow stalls and tethers, by the IPPC directive and by the so-called BSE tax.

Ms Quin: In responding to the hon. Lady, I shall mention each specific sector in turn. The Government have proposed specific schemes in recent months, notably the agricultural development scheme. Furthermore, in December the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made an announcement about the future direction of agriculture under the rural development regulation.

An important aspect and asset of that development regulation is that it is a way of helping sectors not traditionally supported under the common agricultural policy regime. We welcome the flexibility in the rural development regulation to look at all sectors of agriculture and not only those that have traditionally received a great deal of public support through the common agricultural policy. That point needs to be placed firmly on the record.

UK pig producers contributed to the production increases in Europe in 1996 and 1997. In 1998, our pigmeat production reached a level not achieved for many years. However, when prices started to fall, producers here responded in the way in which they always have, by cutting back on production. That would normally have resulted in shortages of pigmeat, which would in turn have resulted in higher prices. That did not happen for a number of reasons. Production continued to rise in some countries, and, even now, after nearly two years of crisis, production levels in countries such as Denmark, Ireland, the Netherlands and France have only just started to fall. Consequently, large quantities of pigmeat are available on the market at very low sterling prices. The hon. Lady mentioned the problems for pig producers caused by the high level of sterling and the low level of the euro during the past year.

UK production still attracts a premium, and we are still net exporters of pork. It is important that those calling for disruptive action against legal imports should bear that in mind, as they may not realise that any retaliation would affect many pig producers still exporting pork products.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Can the Minister confirm that the competition from abroad is not subject to the same humane restrictions that are imposed on our pig industry? Will she also confirm that, since those restrictions are imposed by our own Government's requirements, there is a strong case for the industry to be given special support?

Ms Quin: I shall come to those points, which the hon. Member for Vale of York raised in her speech.

Mr. Swinney: I wish to develop the point raised by the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). Will the Government consider raising consumer awareness of the higher quality of produce created in this country? That would enable shoppers to make a more discerning choice between pigmeat produced here and imports from overseas that may be of inferior quality.

Ms Quin: That is an important point on an issue on which we have been active for some time. I hope, if time permits, to list the initiatives that we have taken in that direction.

The industry in Britain faces problems that our competitors in the European Union and the rest of the world do not. There is no doubt that the BSE crisis has caused the pig industry difficulties. Ironically, at the beginning of the crisis the pig industry, which the hon. Member for Vale of York described as an innocent victim, was an innocent beneficiary. As we know, for a considerable time there was much lower confidence in beef, and many consumers switched to pork and pigmeat. We are all glad that British consumer confidence in the beef industry has been restored, but that has involved a switch in consumption back to beef, which has added to the pig industry's difficulties.

The BSE crisis also resulted in strict health controls that are not mirrored in other countries. There has been a great deal of discussion with the European Commission to look at ways of assisting the industry to combat the effects of the BSE tax, as the pig industry has started to call it. Indeed, the hon. Lady referred to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in his speech to the NFU this morning about the pig industry.

However, the hon. Lady did not give a fair account of our contacts with the Commission. She quoted a letter that she had seen from the European Commission. Another from Commissioner Fischler to the head of the NFU confirmed our contacts in the autumn. However, even that letter did not convey the whole picture, because I had meetings with the National Pig Association in December, and further contacts took place subsequently between the United Kingdom permanent representative in Brussels and various Commission officials.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Minister for Agriculture and Rural Development in the Northern Ireland Executive and I met Commissioner Fischler only a week ago, at the time of the Agriculture Council in Brussels, specifically to talk about the pig industry. There have been a number of contacts and we continue to be willing to work with the industry to find ways forward, but the rules cause difficulty. I do not want to be partisan, but in many ways it is a pity that the effects of the BSE crisis on the pig sector were not identified in contacts with the European Commission at the beginning of the crisis in 1996. As a result, it has been much more difficult to argue for aid subsequently, as it was not part of the crisis measures relating to BSE that were introduced at the beginning.

Miss McIntosh: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Quin: I am sorry, I shall not give way, because I want to refer to some important issues that the hon. Lady raised.

The consumer is a significant factor to take into account. In an intervention the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) referred to the quality and standards of our pigmeat production, and the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) talked about our animal welfare standards. As we are part of the European market and net exporters of pork, we cannot and do not want to take illegal action against imports. However, although the animal welfare regulations, which are important in the pig sector, were introduced with cross-party support in the House—one of the colleagues of the hon. Member for Vale of York, the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Sir R. Body), introduced them in 1991—if we are to introduce stringent and welcome animal welfare regulations, it is sensible to agree them as soon as possible, at least at European level. If we impose stricter, although welcome, standards on ourselves, given European rules, our producers may find themselves with higher costs than our competitors. I welcome the fact that the laying hens directive is an animal welfare regulation that we are taking via the European route, rather than simply via the national route. It is important to bear that in mind.

We have taken a lot of action on misleading labelling. Labelling is crucial, as the hon. Lady said. I commend the work of our verification officer in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Mike Roper, who has been working with supermarkets, caterers and retailers to tighten the labelling on British pork and has worked for wider recognition of the quality and welfare standards of our own product. I believe that we have made progress in recent months. During my ministerial visits to supermarkets and retailers, I have been conscious that the pork quality mark is being used more often and that consumers are more aware of the issues than they were. However, a lot more can be done.

At the National Farmers Union conference this morning, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that the Secretary of State would announce a change in the guidance on country of origin marking to avoid consumers being confused by misleading labels and to give them genuine choice. Consumers have no choice if they are misled by wrong information on labels. Consumer choice is precious and we want to advance it. In his speech this morning, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave an example and said that the changes being introduced will mean that Danish pork can no longer be labelled "British" or "Produced in Britain" simply because it had been cured here. We are aware that people believe that it is wrong to label something as having been made in Britain, if only the packaging or the final part of the process is dealt with here.

In response to an intervention, I referred briefly to the agricultural development scheme and the possibilities under the rural development regulation. The agricultural development scheme initially provided £2 million, which has been used by the pig industry to introduce some interesting and worthwhile applications that have been approved. I pay tribute to the work done by Ladies in Pigs—an organisation that has been active in drawing the attention of consumers to our quality standards and providing them with information when they are shopping about labels and the importance of our standards on pork and pigmeat. I am pleased that a successful project under the auspices of the National Pig Association has been approved under the agricultural development scheme. It involves an interesting innovation in training in the pig sector.

Discussions with the industry continue on how to use additional marketing promotional money for the pig sector, particularly in support of a welfare-linked promotion campaign, which is relevant to the points made by the hon. Member for North Tayside in his intervention.

[Ms Quin]

A number of initiatives show that the Government want a thriving and prosperous pig industry. No Government have a magic wand to make that happen. Pig production is a global industry, but it has tremendous marketing opportunities based not just on the price of the product but on quality and the methods used in production. I believe that our industry can put itself into the position to provide that.

Military Exports

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Touhig.]

9.30 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I express my appreciation through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for Madam Speaker's having given me the chance to initiate the debate, which is topical on two levels. First, the systems of the Export Credits Guarantee Department are currently being reviewed. Secondly, it is topical in terms of the debate on the arms trade. There have been recent controversial cases involving Indonesia, Zimbabwe, Pakistan and other countries. The debate provides an opportunity to bring the two issues together.

I wish to argue that the use of the ECGD to support British arms exports undermines our ethical foreign policy, that it is a bad use of taxpayers' money, that it undermines development and that it adds unnecessarily to the shroud of secrecy that surrounds Government business. I have agreed a division of labour with my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge); I shall concentrate on economics and my hon. Friend will concentrate on ethics, in which she is much better qualified than I am.

I shall start with an anecdote. Almost exactly 25 years ago, I was a Foreign Office official in the Latin American department. I was a first secretary, and much of my time, along with my colleagues, was spent running round worrying about General Pinochet and the chaos in Argentina. Among other things, the British arms industry was very active selling goods to Latin American Governments, who were mainly dictatorships. On one occasion, I think that it was Yarrow which was in the middle of trying to secure a large contract with Ecuador. I was approached by the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade, which thought that it would be a good idea if the Foreign Office lobbied the Treasury. The Treasury had dug its heels in and said, "We are not willing to give export cover through the ECGD for Ecuador."

I sent what I thought was a rather convincing minute to the then Foreign Secretary, now Lord Callaghan, which included phrases that I thought would appeal to a Labour Foreign Secretary. It was all about jobs on the Clyde. Somewhat to my surprise, he sent a rather curt minute, which read, "I am sorry but I have absolutely no intention of writing to the Treasury on this matter. I think that it is a bad use of British taxpayers' money to be suggesting that it should be used to subsidise toys for admirals in Ecuador." I felt rather snubbed at the time but I think, on reflection, that it was an extremely wise judgment and one that increased my respect for Lord Callaghan.

Many of the arguments of those days reverberate today, and essentially they are the arguments that I am advancing. The context is one in which the arms industry is a relatively small but quite important part of Britain's export business. It makes up about 2.5 to 3 per cent. of it. However, it has a much larger profile in terms of the ECGD. When I was involved, it was about 10 per cent. of ECGD business, and that continued throughout the 1970s and 1980s. In the 1990s, it increased to more than 20 per cent. Last year, more than half the business written by the ECGD involved the armaments trade. It has become extremely important.

The key factor is that, however we dress up the language, the trade is subsidised. It is often said that the ECGD operates on a self-financing basis, but, in underlying economic terms, it does not. It is important to set out the reasons for that, and I rely quite heavily on some very good analytical work done by the centre for defence studies at the university of York, by Professor Keith Hartley and Steve Martin among others. The point they make is that taxpayers' subsidy for arms exports through the ECGD consists of various elements. One is an interest subsidy, which operates in some instances. There is a difference between the interest rate paid by the customer and the interest rate charged by the banks, and the ECGD covers that difference.

In addition, and probably more important, the ECGD provides political risk insurance. There is a market for such insurance, but, in many instances, the cost would be prohibitive. In effect, the ECGD provides a subsidised rate.

Another perspective is public investment. If London Transport or the Post Office were borrowing money for a new investment, the Treasury would expect them to earn a return of about 6 per cent. in real terms. The ECGD is not expected to earn that return. Instead, it is expected to break even. With a little work on a calculator, it is clear that the present value of a loan—it is the difference between a 6 per cent. return and a nil return—can be substantial when large sums are involved.

That is a generous interpretation, because the public accounts show that the ECGD is not even breaking even. Last year, there was a net deficit of £217 million. The Government's three-year public accounts projections include an expected deficit of more than £800 million in 2001-02. We are talking about something that is clearly sub-economic, and that applies to the armaments business in particular.

Attempts have been made—I have referred to the York economists—to quantify the cost to the taxpayer. The figures are obviously imprecise because there are no definitive numbers, but the economists have come up with figures that seem plausible. They have estimated that about £240 million a year is the cost to the taxpayer of arms exports alone, within the ECGD's portfolio. They have taken account of the losses over the past 10 years and applied 30 per cent. of them, which is the estimate of the rough proportion of arms business to the total. Having thought about the figures, I find that estimate rather conservative. For example, 40 per cent. of the ECGD's outstanding debts stem from arms business. Therefore, 30 per cent.—

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): The hon. Gentleman has initiated an extremely important debate and I am sorry that I was not present at the beginning of his remarks. It is extraordinary that there are no Labour Members present apart from the Minister, who looks bereft.

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

I trust that the hon. Gentleman will not examine only one side of the balance sheet. Will he look at the other side too? That would show that, without these defence exports, Britain could not afford to buy equipment for its armed forces that had been manufactured in the United Kingdom. The economies of scale would be such that it would be prohibitively expensive.

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is correct in an economic context. I accept that. There is a balance of views in terms of reducing the cost of procurement, to which the hon. Gentleman has correctly pointed. There are also debits which I have not mentioned. There are many Ministry of Defence costs involved in the selling process. Much equipment should probably have been bought abroad on economic grounds, but it is manufactured here because of the support that the industry receives from the arms export business. The York studies to which I have referred suggest that, when all the economic factors are taken into account, including the important point that the hon. Gentleman has raised, the outturn is a substantial negative.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a slight distortion in the statistics inasmuch as, for 1998-99, the figures show that more than half of ECGD funding was defence related? However, that was a one-off because it was the result of the Asian financial crisis. When account is taken of a longer period, we see that the average annual funding is about 13 per cent. When we talk about percentages and what is funded via the ECGD, recent years have shown blips and distortions, which perhaps give a rather different picture from the norm.

Dr. Cable: There are blips and distortions, which is why I said a few moments ago that I would not regard the figure that I quoted as a mechanical slide-rule projection of what will happen in future.

It is useful, however, to think about some of the reasons that might trigger future defaults. I had not seen the detailed figures until I prepared for the debate, but a large part of British outstanding export credit debt is owed by Indonesia. That arises from the Hawk contract, which involves £750 million. About £50 million of that has already been written off. I understand that the Indonesians are continuing to service their interest. It is not difficult to imagine circumstances in which the Indonesian political environment might completely unravel. We know that there is a virtual civil war in several parts of that country. I can envisage circumstances in which all the outstanding debt would have to be written off.

A large part of the lumpiness to which the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) refers relates particularly to contracts with Saudi Arabia and Brunei. It may be that, in 10 or 20 years' time, those countries will be stable and continuing to pay their debts. However, one of my last jobs in the oil industry before entering Parliament was to examine the public finances of Saudi Arabia. It was not a terribly happy scene. The Saudis have enormous private assets overseas, but their public sector financing is vulnerable. I shall be surprised if they remain solvent for the next five or 10 years, particularly if the oil market becomes adverse to their interests. There are blips—the hon. Lady is right—but it would be unwise to be complacent about the ECGD's capacity to continue to have its debts serviced.

In addition to taxpayer costs, there are a couple of other reasons why one should worry about this part of ECGD business. One is the impact on development. Even someone as hard-headed as Mr. Camdessus of the International Monetary Fund has argued that it is undesirable for western countries to use the ECGD, or a comparable export credit agency, to provide debt-related financing to many developing countries. The simple reason is that they acquire a fixed interest obligation, not a productive asset.

The logic of that is accepted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under the Mauritius agreement, the Government have agreed that export credit guarantees for armaments will not be applied to, I think, 63 developing countries; initially, it was 40.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. Is he aware that the Chancellor's much vaunted ethical dimension to export credits is totally, utterly and completely meaningless? Of the 63 countries that he says will no longer be eligible for credit guarantees in respect of defence exports from this country, only one has received ECGD defence credits since 1987: Kenya, which accounted for, I think, £60 million. It is complete and absolute nonsense. The Chancellor is posing as a friend of the third world. It is totally hypocritical.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would be easy for the hon. Gentleman to get into the debate without long interventions. They are not helpful.

Dr. Cable: I was aware that most of the countries were off cover. I had not realised that the position was as extreme as the hon. Gentleman describes. He makes a valid point. If the Chancellor accepts the logic of withdrawing export credit cover for armaments to low-income countries, why will that not be applied to all low-income countries, including those on cover? Indeed, why will it not be applied to all developing countries? All sorts of inconsistencies are creeping into the admittedly more developmentally minded approach that the ECGD has adopted under the Government.

There are all sorts of anomalies, which the Minister could perhaps explain. For example, as of the end of last year, all exporters have been required to fill in a questionnaire on environmental sustainability, but armament exporters are spared that chore. Why? If it is a serious restriction, why will it not be applied to them?

In addition to the cost to the taxpayer and the impact on development, export credit guarantee support of arms exports creates an additional tier of secrecy in a part of Government that should be more open. The ECGD annual report of 1997-98, when about one quarter of British exports through the ECGD were armaments, devoted two and a half paragraphs to arms exports. That was rather less than was devoted to a public transport project in Panama. Last year, when the share of arms in the ECGD's portfolio grew to 50 per cent., the coverage in the annual report contracted to two lines. That is absurd.

Many Members who table parliamentary questions often find that the answers are cryptic in the extreme. It is an area of secrecy, which is not necessary. Major General Sharman, chairman of the Defence Manufacturers Association, has said as much. He sees no reason why there should not be much more openness.

The Minister may be able to explain why it is not possible to break down—perhaps he will—British arms exports through the ECGD by country and by contract. Why cannot we be told which British companies benefit, in order of merit? There is an assumption that British Aerospace benefits most, but it would be useful to know. Why can we not know? Can we not be given a breakdown of the business by country, by contract and by sums of money? Can we not be given a breakdown of the debt outstanding to the ECGD by country, by project and by sums of money? All that would help us to understand what is going on. The fact that we are not given that information, or not given it easily, creates an impression that something is going wrong, when it may not be.

The conclusion is that continuing to support arms exports through the ECGD is unattractive. There is quite wide political consensus on that point. A short time ago, we tabled early-day motion 191, which 95 Members have supported, most of them Labour Back Benchers. On the other side of the political spectrum, one of the most scathing and penetrating criticisms of the way in which the ECGD operates was provided by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), as he now is, who was special adviser to two Chancellors and who exposed many of the arguments that I have advanced.

Moreover, one of the most articulate criticisms of the use of the ECGD for export credit cover is provided by the free market economist Sam Brittan, who clearly believes that people who believe in competitive markets should not support the practice. Across the spectrum, there is growing criticism of the practice.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Dr. Kim Howells): Is the hon. Gentleman referring to Sam Brittan's article in the infamous free market New Statesman?

Dr. Cable: I was, but before Sam Brittan defected to the New Statesman, he was saying much the same thing in the Financial Times. I do not know his politics, but I have read his eloquent writings, which are very much in a free market vein and with much of which I agree. My point is that the criticism is eclectic. It is not driven from any particular standpoint.

I go over some of the arguments that are advanced for not stopping the practice. The first is about jobs. There is, of course, a compelling argument here. None of us wants to be flippant about people's jobs. It is estimated that roughly 150,000 jobs, mainly in the aerospace industry, are effectively subsidised by ECGD export credits for arms: roughly £2,000 a job. It is not clear why those jobs should be subsidised, rather than others. We go back to the argument about why we have such selective intervention by the taxpayer, but if the Government feel that a particular segment of manufacturing industry needs public support—perhaps it does; perhaps there is a special argument about capital goods, although I am not sure what that is—why can that not be dealt with by developing the civil side of the ECGD business instead?

If the Minister talks to the Confederation of British Industry or the Engineering Employers Federation, he will find much frustration—it relates partly to the point that was made by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth)—that many countries are currently off cover. A good recent example was a big public transport contract with Iran, which other export credit agencies were willing to support and the ECGD does not. If there really is a feeling that the ECGD should be used to promote British exports and jobs in that sector, why can that not be done by rebalancing the portfolio in favour of civil products?

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman will have noted with some interest—which is why I am surprised at his last comment—the third report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the future of the ECGD. One of its conclusions states:

> "Some suggest that defence exports close out other exports; we have received no evidence to indicate that ECGD is biased towards defence-related exports, nor that there is a substantial default rate."

Dr. Cable: As the hon. Lady implied in the first sentence of her quotation, there is a debate as to whether there is a real opportunity cost. It is an open debate. As there are well-developed lines of communication with the big armaments exporters such BAe, it is easier to continue to support the arms business. Of course it receives much political support as well through Ministers and intergovernmental relationships, but I should have thought that, with a major effort, there is no reason why the balance of the portfolio should not be shifted and why dependence on arms export trade should not be reduced.

The next argument advanced could be encapsulated in the question, "Why should Britain do it on its own?", and in the belief that, if it is a desirable policy, we should do it as part of a multilateral initiative. There is some sense in the argument. However, I sometimes fail to understand why we take the view that we should not stop harming ourselves unless other countries agree to do the same. It is a fallacy pervading much of trade policy.

In many respects, the Government have given the lie to that argument in their debt relief initiatives. British Governments—not only the current one, although the current Chancellor has done much very good pioneering work on debt relief—including the two previous, Conservative Chancellors, have gone out on their own on debt relief for low-income countries. It is part of the multilateral initiative that we should relieve debt before other countries do so, and we implicitly accepted that, by our writing off some of our debt, the Japanese, the Germans and the Americans might recover their debt rather sooner. Therefore, if policy is right, it is better to implement it both unilaterally and multilaterally. I argue for doing both in parallel.

Some people argue that there are countries that, for perfectly good reasons, want to acquire our armaments, and that there are perfectly good reasons for letting them have them. I am not a pacifist and see good reasons why many developing couples might wish to arm themselves.

India, for example, is a democratic country—at least as democratic as we are—and is well run, with a relatively successful economy and a reasonable standard of governance. It is threatened from at least two directions and might wish to acquire British arms. However, if it does wish to acquire British arms, there is no reason why it should not buy them on the market. If we want to help India as a developing country, we could help it through the aid programme. There is no justification for keeping the ECGD's role in all of this as a disguised way of helping India or other worthy developing countries to acquire the armaments that they need for their defence.

I believe that Britain should cease to provide ECGD credit cover for armaments by phasing it out. We should do so on our own, but simultaneously try to develop a multilateral initiative. I hope that, as a first step in the debate, the Minister will open up the whole subject and lift some of the secrecy enveloping it.

9.52 am

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I am delighted to speak in this debate, although I have to confess that initially I had not intended to do so. Last week, I saw on the Order Paper that the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) had been successful in securing this debate, on an extremely important subject, and so it did not come as a complete surprise to me.

I was very interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments. He comes from an oil background and will know probably better than I that Britain's most important and largest defence export arrangement is the Al-Yamamah contract with Saudi Arabia, which is based substantially on the oil market. It is a complicated transaction, but essentially involves defence exports for oil. My view of the contract—to which I shall return later—is not as pessimistic as his, as I think that there are important lessons to be learned from it.

My background, before being elected to the House, includes 12 years in international banking. I now represent the Aldershot constituency, which includes Farnborough, where the headquarters of what we now have to call BAe Systems are located. Formerly, the company was known to us all as British Aerospace, and I suspect that—despite the efforts of the company's management—it will continue to be called British Aerospace.

Nevertheless, BAe Systems is not only Britain's most important defence contractor, but is now the third largest defence contractor in the world. It is therefore an extremely important company not only to my constituency, but to the whole of the United Kingdom.

My association with British Aerospace goes back over many years, but was particularly close when I was in the City, in international banking, and acutely aware of the importance of defence exports. I had discussions with British Aerospace about various projects on which it was seeking to secure support.

I am bound to tell the hon. Member for Twickenham that he is living in cloud cuckoo land if he thinks that there is a realistic prospect of withdrawing ECGD support for export sales without a markedly damaging effect on Britain's most successful manufacturing industry—the aerospace industry. The reality—as was brought home to me every time I discussed these matters with British Aerospace and other defence contractors—is that other defence manufacturers around the world enjoy the support of their domestic equivalent of the ECGD, whether it be COFACE, in France, or the American organisation, the name of which I cannot remember—

Dr. Cable: Ex-Im bank.

Mr. Howarth: No; it might be federal military sales. In any case, United States industry benefits from the financial support of the United States Government.

I therefore tell the hon. Member for Twickenham that—however much I am impressed by his adherence to free market economics, which is a belief not always expressed by Liberal Democrat Members; I certainly welcome the philosophy that he has expounded—the practical reality of the world in which we live is that if we withdrew support, we should be doing great damage to our own defence manufacturing base, which is a very important component of the United Kingdom.

The hon. Gentleman lightly dismissed defence manufacturing as 2 to 3 per cent. of Britain's economic activity, but the fact is that it employs 400,000 people in the United Kingdom.

Although the Minister is not supported by a great many other Labour Members today, he is a formidable man in his own right and is worth 10 of his Labour colleagues. I have no fear that he will not be able to rise to the challenge that he has been offered by the hon. Member for Twickenham. Nevertheless, the truth is that many Labour Members represent constituencies in which defence contracting is a very important component. I am honestly surprised that none of those Labour Members are participating in this debate, because they are always evident in the House for Defence Question Time.

How do I address you, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman (Dr. Michael Clark): I am just discussing that very point, Mr. Howarth. I think that it would be correct if you called me Dr. Clark.

Mr. Howarth: I am delighted to be guided by you, Dr. Clark. Now that I know how properly to address you, I shall continue.

For an hon. Member who, like me, was elected to the House in 1983, rested between engagements—between 1992-97—and returned to the House in 1997, to the most privileged seat to which I could ever aspire, Aldershot, home of the British Army and birthplace of British aviation—I think that I am a round peg in a round hole—one of the most astonishing and fascinating features of being in the House is to see how the Labour party has changed.

Dr. Clark, you will remember that, when you and I were first elected to the House, ranged against us were all those Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament people, beating swords into ploughshares. What are we faced with today? We are faced with one Labour Member after another standing up and demanding that the Government buy bigger and better weapons, preferably from their own constituency.

Mrs. Browning: I totally agree with the point that my hon. Friend has just made. However, perhaps he will add a caveat—that among the Labour Members of the European Parliament, perhaps in the person, for example, of Mrs. Glenys Kinnock, we hear the old Labour-CND message still coming through.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is right. I gather that the Labour Members of the European Parliament are part of what is called the Socialist group. That word has been expunged from the new Labour dictionary, so what they do is probably a source of discomfort to the Prime Minister and the other promoters of new Labour. I suspect that you will call me out of order, Dr. Clark, if I carry on with that argument.

There has been a fascinating change in this country. There is a consensus on the importance of defence and defence exports. There are three reasons why defence exports are not just good for the United Kingdom, but essential. Those reasons go beyond the desire to protect 400,000 jobs in the UK. I made that point to the hon. Member for Twickenham because I felt that he was belittling the contribution of defence contracting to the United Kingdom's industrial base; but I am not in the business of giving subsidies to keep jobs in a particular sector. That would be inconsistent with my philosophy and that of my party over the past 20 years.

The first reason is that, without defence exports, we could not afford to buy domestically produced aeroplanes, missiles, heavy artillery and similar equipment, because there would be no economies of scale. I shall illustrate that with one example. As the country wrangled over what was going to succeed the Tornado combat aircraft—we now know that it is to be the Eurofighter—there was serious concern at British Aerospace, because the production run was coming to an end with nothing to put in its place. What happened? The Al-Yamamah contract with Saudi Arabia provided a large enough order to keep the production line open. Saudi Arabia then made an attrition buy—a technical expression in the trade for replacing lost aircraft that crash, fall out of the sky or are shot down—of a further 12 Tornado aircraft. That kept the production line going until the Eurofighter—or the Typhoon, as we now call it, which is a much better name—came on stream.

If we had simply relied on domestic demand for Tornado aircraft, the unit cost would have been prohibitive. The Public Accounts Committee would have said that it was ridiculous and that we should have bought some other aircraft off the shelf, such as the F16 from the United States. That would have left us dependent on the United States for the supply of critical equipment and would have cut us off from the supply of the next generation of combat aircraft. As a result of the defence export services provided by the Ministry of Defence and the fantastic effort of the Government—even the Foreign Office—and industry coming together in concerted UK activity, we were able to sell Tornado aircraft to Saudi Arabia, bringing the unit costs down and keeping us in the business of producing high-tech combat aircraft.

The second reason why defence exports are essential is that they help our foreign policy objectives. Supplying our friends with military equipment is a practical way of demonstrating our support. That is not a euphemism for propping up corrupt regimes. Few countries can match our commitment to liberty, our devotion to democracy and our belief in fair play. Few countries play cricket and even fewer play cricket like we do, unfortunately. Other countries fall short of the standards that we set.

Defence exports help us to influence events in critical parts of the world. This Government, like their Conservative predecessors, are keen to demonstrate Britain's influence in the world. The Prime Minister is extraordinarily keen to play soldiers around the world. I do not object to the principle of that, although I have some doubt about his motives. By supporting defence exports, we are able to make friends and influence events around the world. Some of the key countries to which we export, such as Malaysia and Saudi Arabia, are very good allies of the United Kingdom. Defence exports help to strengthen those ties.

The third reason is that defence exports enable us to exert further influence. If we supply critical defence equipment to a country where the Government change and the new regime behaves unacceptably, those exports give us a hold over them. I am astonished that, while the Foreign Secretary trumpets an ethical foreign policy, when he had the chance to influence events in Indonesia and Zimbabwe, he signally failed to do so. There has been a huge amount of wringing of hands over Indonesia, but the Foreign Secretary has allowed the Hawk contract to go ahead. In my view, last year was the time to say, "No more." That would have enabled us to exercise influence, but the Government chose not to do so.

It is appalling that the Government will continue to supply Hawk parts to Zimbabwe—a country that, in the league table of corruption and incompetence, must surely be if not at the top then at least in the top 10. The idea that we have an obligation to continue to supply spare parts to the disgustingly corrupt and incompetent Mugabe is profoundly offensive. The Government should have said, "If you go ahead and nationalise the land of white farmers in your country, do not expect a single spark plug for any of your Hawk aircraft, 'cos we ain't gonna supply it. Talk some common sense and run your country in a proper fashion and we will resume the supply."

Dr. Howells: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman says about Zimbabwe. I was there recently and saw the appalling politically motivated spiral of decline in a country run largely by incompetent people. However, I have figures showing that between 1987 and 1994 the previous Government supplied Zimbabwe with £61,584,983 of defence of equipment. Did the Conservatives see the decline coming, or was the Government of Zimbabwe okay in those days?

Mr. Howarth: I shall probably surprise the Minister by saying that I would not have done that had I been a Minister, but, as he probably knows, I have a slightly different view of Zimbabwe. I think that it should still be called Rhodesia. I find it ironic that people should complain about the current system there or make excuses for Mugabe when some of us remember the days when it was properly run. In those days, there was freedom for those who were law-abiding and the country was prosperous.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I think I know what the hon. Lady is about to say.

Dr. Tonge: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does. Some time ago, during a debate on Sudan, the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) said that it used to be a great country with "the blues ruling the blacks". Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we should take back all the old British empire countries and run them directly from London? Would that please the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady poses an interesting question. To be quite candid, the answer is, in part, yes. It is a complete absurdity for us to imagine that we can continue in the present fashion, where corrupt and incompetent dictatorships around Africa continue ruining the lives of their people and demanding money from the international community, from agencies such as the International Monetary Fund and from us. However, that is a subject for another debate.

I shall conclude, as I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) has some important remarks to make. I have given three reasons why it is absolutely essential that we recognise the role of defence exports. It is a most honourable profession that greatly benefits the British people, British industry and the countries that we support.

In regard to the Al-Yamamah contract, having been the parliamentary private secretary to Baroness Thatcher, I do not think that people recognise just what a fantastic deal that was. The personal chemistry between the noble Lady and King Fahd of Saudi Arabia was probably responsible for securing more jobs than any other contract in the history of these islands.

In answer to the hon. Member for Twickenham, who based his remarks principally on the role of ECGD, I would be most reluctant to withdraw from the British defence industry the availability of ECGD support. It would make us totally uncompetitive overseas, so we would be cutting off our nose to spite our face.

I was amazed to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer trumpeting the announcement that 63 countries would be denied the availability of ECGD support for defence exports, when only one of them had ever benefited or was likely to benefit anyway. I found it extraordinarily—

Mrs. Browning: Bogus.

Mr. Howarth: Exactly. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply to the debate. I am sure that he will agree that it is important for the United Kingdom to continue to support our defence industry, which not only generates jobs and wealth, but is a source of tremendous innovation and excitement.

10.14 am

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on his success in introducing an Adjournment debate on this important subject. Last week, I tried to get a debate on arms exports and an ethical foreign policy, so I shall concentrate rather more on the ethics, which I consider to be an even more important subject. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his excellent and well-informed speech.

I was also interested in the speech by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). I see the beginnings of an entirely new Conservative party policy. The shadow Cabinet has been reshuffled and now the hon. Gentleman is proposing not only that we pull out of Europe, but that we break our ties with the United States and re-form the British empire. I expect his next proposal will be that we send an expeditionary force to Washington.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. How on earth can she make those assertions on the basis of what I said? I made no suggestion that we should cut ourselves off from the United States—far from it. I made no remarks about withdrawing from Europe or re-establishing the British empire. I simply said that one or two countries could well benefit from the expertise that we used to give them and under which they flourished.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman must realise that I have every right to extrapolate his ideas and develop them.

The Chairman: Order. This is not a debate about empire. Will hon. Members please get back to the subject in hand.

Dr. Tonge: I apologise, Dr. Clark. I could not resist making that point.

I have do not have the background to speak on the economic arguments in relation to the ECGD and arms exports: my profession is the medical profession, which has been severely humbled in recent days. My only connection with the subject is that, until a few years ago, there was a big British Aerospace factory—which used to be the old Hawker factory—in the Richmond Park constituency. So my interest is not a current one.

I understand the economic argument that has been made for arms exports and the arms industry. I am not a pacifist; I do not want to stop arms exports. I understand that they are part of the real world. However, I question some of them—especially those that are supported by export credit guarantees—that involve countries whose economies may be in a parlous state or unstable. Suppose that the export credit guarantees are never paid off and the arms sales result in an extremely expensive war—they did in the case of Iraq—and a military campaign to which we have to contribute; and suppose that our Government have to provide humanitarian aid and then development aid to rebuild a country that has been destroyed by war. In such cases I question the economic arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Aldershot. They may be good in the very short term, but ultimately it seems to me a crazy policy which places a heavy burden on the British taxpayer.

Let us consider the jobs argument. Of course there would be job losses if the arms industry contracted, but if we cut out only the part of the industry that supplies arms under export credit guarantees, it might not affect such a large proportion of total arms exports. People who work in the arms industry are generally highly qualified and employable. Every year, hundreds of thousands of people change jobs or retrain, so I do not find the jobs argument insurmountable.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Lady will know that I represent a seat in Devon and that military issues are of great importance in the south-west. I remind her that for many years I have listened to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who has Westland Helicopters in his constituency. The helicopters produced there are used both for peaceful and for military purposes. The right hon. Gentleman advocated a rather different view of job losses at Westland and in the west country.

Dr. Tonge: So would many Members with arms manufacturers in their constituencies, but, at some point, we shall have to bite the bullet. People in many industries have to consider retraining. One example is the farming industry, on which the hon. Lady used to speak on behalf of her party. I do not see why the arms industry should be immune. I would also remind her that my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) is no longer our party leader and is quite entitled to express his opinion.

The other argument advanced by the hon. Member for Aldershot—the old adage that if we do not do it, someone else will—was ably dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham. Sometimes, we must take a lead on these issues. We took a lead on debt. Indeed, the previous Conservative Government took a lead on debt, which was followed up by the Labour Government. Both British Governments in recent years have spoken and acted honourably on debt. Why can we not do the same in relation to the arms trade? Why can we not take the lead? No wonder this country does not know where it is going if we cannot make a stand occasionally.

The Government have made some fine attempts to give moral leadership. I was in the Locarno room—a wonderful place—in the summer of 1997, and found it difficult to control my emotions as the Foreign Secretary described his new foreign policy with its ethical dimension. He told us how the world would be changed and that Britain would be a good boy after all.

On many occasions, I have heard how passionately the Secretary of State for International Development feels about the prevention of conflict and about the need to restrict arms sales to countries which are unstable or are in need of development. I suspect that she is frequently overruled.

Dr. Howells: As the Minister who has to sign off all the arms export deals that we send out—and I have been in this job since a year ago last July—I point out to the hon. Lady that there has never been one on which we have not consulted the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development. We have done that for every export and have never received one—

Dr. Tonge indicated dissent.

Dr. Howells: The hon. Lady may shake her head, but I am the guy who has to sign off those exports. Never once have we received from the DFID or the FCO an objection to anything that we have signed.

Dr. Tonge: I thank the Minister for that intervention, but I was really referring to the annual report on arms sales. During the last Session, I was a member of the Select Committee that reviewed the annual report. I think that some arms exports to Eritrea were refused by the DFID, but that was overruled by the Department of Trade and Industry—or whoever it was. The Minister is not correct. Decisions are overruled. Indeed, when the annual report on arms exports is produced, the Secretary of State for International Development does not sign that report as other Ministers do, even though she is a member of the Government.

Dr. Howells: I have learned much since I entered the Government about how difficult and complicated government is. Surely, the hon. Lady must realise that, as the DTI is responsible for sponsoring exports, one Minister has to sign them off. There cannot be an arrangement whereby every Minister in every Department signs off every export contract. That would be nonsense. Surely the hon. Lady has enough experience to understand that.

Dr. Tonge: I do indeed understand the point, but in the context of the Government's declaration that they would have a foreign policy with an ethical dimension, and that they would adhere to the UK and the EU code of conduct on arms sales. I shall explain how they have not done so. I stick to my guns: whichever Minister signs off the sales, he or she should take into consideration the opinion of the Department that is concerned with development and the prevention of conflict. If that is not done, there will be more trouble for this country and more expenditure in the long term.

Dr. Howells rose—

Dr. Tonge: I shall not give way again, because I want to make progress.

I refer to the Government's response to the International Development Committee's report on conflict prevention. I was a member of the Committee. The report included the recommendation that "the Government extend indefinitely its moratorium on the use of export credits for unproductive expenditure and urge the Government to exert further pressure for the adoption internationally of such a commitment."

The Government responded rather cryptically:

"The Government welcomes the Committee's support for the Mauritius Mandate"— to which my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham referred.

"The Government remains committed to limiting our export credits to Heavily Indebted Poor Countries"— the hon. Member for Aldershot pointed out that that was no great matter—

"to those for productive expenditure."

The Government were not upholding the foreign policy with an ethical dimension about which we had heard so much. They were not even upholding the commitment not to sell arms to countries where there was an identifiable risk that the equipment might be used for internal repression or for aggression against another country. I shall return to that matter later in my speech.

This foreign policy has been trampled over by the Government's response to arms exports—whether or not they are supported by export credit guarantees. The Government have recently stated that they would not resume the sale of arms to Pakistan—everyone agrees that Pakistan is extremely unstable and no one knows how matters in that country will progress—but they will consider each sale case by case. They get themselves out of the hoop in that way.

As we have already heard, the decision has been taken to resume selling arms to Indonesia, when that country is subject to huge internal upheavals. We have not yet sorted out East Timor; East Timorese refugees are still being held in West Timor and are not being allowed to return home. All that is happening, and even though the Indonesians have not paid off previous export credits, we are selling them more equipment—presumably backed by more export credits.

Three quarters of the countries in sub-Saharan Africa are engaged in armed conflict, or are confronted by a significant threat from armed groups. Arms exports to the region almost doubled last year. Excluding South Africa, spending on arms in sub-Saharan Africa increased by 14 per cent., at a time when the region's economic growth rose by less than 1 per cent. in real terms.

There are at least 11,000 Zimbabwean troops in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Zimbabwe, Namibia, Angola and the President of Congo are all fighting a war against Rwanda, Uganda and the Congolese rebels. There is a terrible mess in the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Zimbabwe is involved in it.

The estimated cost of the war for Zimbabwe is £1 million a day. That is in a country whose economic situation is regarded as extremely serious. The country is heavily in debt. There are record levels of unemployment; the inflation rate is 57 per cent; and an AIDS epidemic has reduced life expectancy to less than 50 years. Despite all that, we are selling arms to Zimbabwe. As the hon. Member for Aldershot said, what a foolish decision that was.

Furthermore, to return to the Minister's point, those sales are not compatible with the European Union code of conduct to which we have signed up. Both in criterion 4 and criterion 8—I carefully dug them out last night—we fail vis-a-vis Zimbabwe. We are not obeying the code of conduct by resuming arms sales to that country. Whither, then, our ethical foreign policy?

When are the Government going to regain the moral leadership of which we had such high hopes early in this Parliament, for goodness sake? Are we to go on indefinitely feeding wars and human misery? Will that new foreign policy with an ethical dimension never be reinstated?

One of the researchers reminded me of some lines from Milton's "Paradise Lost":

"So here the Archangel paused,

Betwixt a world destroyed and a world restored."

I want to see a world restored for the sake of my children and my grandchildren. I feel strongly about that. I am not a pacifist, but I want the world restored. To do that, we must bring back the ethical dimension that the Government have lost. We can make a start by stopping the subsidy on arms exports.

10.30 am

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): May I say how pleased I am to contribute, on behalf of the Conservative party, to this debate? Clearly, matters have been raised over which we must accept that there is a philosophical divide. There is a difference between the views of the Liberal Democrat speakers and those that I shall set out and the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). Quite where the Minister stands remains to be seen, but I shall leave him to make his case.

On 27 July 1997, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs said:

"The Government is committed to the maintenance of a strong defence industry, which is a strategic part of our industrial base, as well as of our defence effort."

Those sentiments were also underlined in the strategic defence review, which said:

"The British defence industry is outstandingly successful and a vital national asset."

In the recent defence White Paper, the Government committed themselves to

"ensuring the survival of a successful British defence industry".

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) is clearly disappointed with the Labour Government. I do not want to say too much about that because it is for the Minister to respond to her disappointment. However, from the statements that I have quoted, the Government appear genuinely to want to support our arms industry. They realise the economic and strategic importance of defence manufacture in this country, and we wholeheartedly agree with them on that. However, I agree with the hon. Lady in that those statements do not relate to statements made elsewhere about a so-called ethical foreign policy, particularly as it relates to arms. I shall come to that point shortly.

The defence industry is important. I listened carefully to the hon. Lady when she said that she was not a pacifist. However, if her argument were taken to its logical conclusion, it would surely lead not just to the withdrawal of Government financial support through export credit guarantees, but to this country's not supplying arms at all. Who finances arms sales is an academic issue if one's philosophical position is that it is bad to supply arms to certain countries or to supply certain types of arms.

Dr. Tonge: On a point of explanation, I made no suggestion that we could not sell arms to countries such as our fellow members of the European Union or to stable countries in the rest of the world. My point was that we should adhere to the European code of conduct on arms sales and not sell arms to unstable countries or when they could be used for aggression or internal repression.

Mrs. Browning: The principle of where the arms are sold must be taken into account and it is, indeed, taken into account through the licensing process. However, the hon. Lady will recall, as I do only too well, that, at times of conflict in our own lifetimes, we have sold arms to some of our nearest and dearest neighbours only to find them used against us. Her proposition is no guarantee that there would not be what she would regard as unfortunate recycling or that we would not be the target of our own bullets.

As a percentage of gross domestic product, the United Kingdom has the world's second largest defence industrial base, employing—and this is important—355,000 people, who make up approximately 10 per cent. of the UK's manufacturing and industrial work force. That translates as 11 per cent. of the country's industrial and manufacturing output, equating to 50 per cent. of the aerospace and shipbuilding manufacturing that takes place in the UK and 40 per cent. of the electronics industry.

I declare a constituency interest. Electronics companies in my constituency supply the defence sector and they are at the cutting edge of technology. I have had no hesitation in supporting the work that they do and their attempts to bid for contracts. I have given them my full support.

The primary function of the defence industry is to supply military equipment to the UK armed forces. Problems with supply of essential war material during the Falklands and the Gulf wars have underlined the importance of an adequate domestic defence industrial base. However, the industry cannot be sustained by Ministry of Defence procurement alone; exports are essential to its survival. In recent years, defence exports have been a British success story, with the UK regularly taking more than 20 per cent. of the world defence export market. Defence exports reduce the MOD's procurement costs by allowing longer production runs and lower unit costs.

At this stage, I wish to point out that Members who are interested in defence matters are concerned at reports about the standard of equipment that has been supplied to our armed forces. Cost is a factor, but the quality of what we provide to our armed forces is of primary importance.

The commercial exploitation levy adds between £350 million and £400 million to the defence budget. More importantly, a third—approximately 130,000—of defence industry jobs depend on exports, with more than one third of production going abroad.

It has been alleged that the defence industry receives an unfair preference when it comes to ECGD cover. The most often cited figure is the one that I gave to the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) in an intervention. The 1998-99 figures shows defence cover at more than half the total of ECGD funding for that year. That figure, as we know, was the result of the Asian financial crisis and it is important that it does not distort the figures for previous and subsequent years in which cover dropped to as low as 13 per cent. The average figure for defence cover in the period 1988-89 to 1998-99 is just under 28 per cent. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry concluded that there is "no evidence to indicate that ECGD is biased towards defence-related exports".

Other countries provide far greater assistance for their defence industries. Both France and Germany provide direct financial assistance to their defence companies and both countries are far more generous when it comes to export cover. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot was right to mention the United States. Defence procurement and the provision for defence manufacture in the United States is important and we must bear in mind the huge global market in second-hand defence equipment that comes from the United States. In itself, that has an effect on the price of defence procurement around the world. However, the United States helps its exporters with long-term subsidised loans as part of the foreign military sales scheme.

Dr. Cable: Is the hon. Lady advocating that we try to match such contributions or does she agree with her parliamentary colleague who was the special adviser to the previous Prime Minister and who said:

"It is illogical to indulge in a competition to give away our own exports through an auction of subsidies . . . companies should reduce costs and make themselves competitive, not rely on state aids."

Does the hon. Lady agree with that?

Mrs. Browning: Given my earlier remarks about the primary importance of defence manufacture to underpin our domestic requirements, if taxpayers' money has to be used to underwrite the guarantees through the ECGD, I thoroughly support its use. There is no doubt about that. We did that in government and we shall continue to support its use. We must consider the sector and its strategic importance to the UK's military and defence provision.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): The hon. Lady referred to what happened under the previous Government, but am I not correct in thinking that, in 1997, the bad debts to the ECGD included military support that had been given to China, Indonesia, Iraq and Nigeria, which at the time was under a dictatorship? When she says that she is happy for taxpayers' money to subsidise the defence industry, does she not feel at all uncomfortable with those examples?

Mrs. Browning: No, I do not. Although I do not have to hand detailed information about every one of those countries, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman for the simple reason that, under the process by which ECGD cover is given, at the time when the cover is underwritten and signed off as the Minister described, every grant is considered on its merits and the balance of risk. The nature of the scheme means that there will be times when that risk is such that the Government have to step in. That is a matter of balance.

[Mrs. Browning]

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the third report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the future of the Export Credits Guarantee Department, which covers that matter in detail. It is not over-critical of the process.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is not the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) that he has selectively listed countries that have at some time been in default, whereas many other countries that have been beneficiaries of defence exports for which ECGD credit has been available have continued to honour their obligation, and their premiums are helping to defray the cost of meeting the credits on those countries that are defaulting?

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend describes the process correctly. As I said at the beginning of my speech, there is a philosophical divide. If one is opposed per se to public money underwriting or providing a safety net for such transactions, clearly one will not find any formula under which those transactions are acceptable. That is what divides us in the Chamber today.

Mr. Savidge: I am not talking about being opposed per se to subsidising our defence industry. However, many people in this country might feel slightly unhappy if they knew, for example, that we had subsidised Saddam Hussein's military build-up. That is why I chose the countries that I mentioned in my intervention. I could have listed other countries, and many people in Britain would be disturbed to find that taxpayers' money was being used to subsidise the build-up of those countries' military might.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman will know the history of the situation as well as anyone else in the Chamber. When those arms were sold, the political situation, particularly between Iraq and Iran, was very different from the present situation. He cannot expect any Government, of whatever political persuasion, to second-guess what might happen several years later as a result of a change in political leadership or situation.

Dr. Howells: In response to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge), I have been reliably informed—I hope this helps the hon. Lady—that there never was any ECGD cover for defence business in China or Iraq.

Mrs. Browning: I am most grateful to the Minister. We could make a very good team on this subject, and I offer him my services unreservedly in case he ever needs to call on me as a running mate in future debates on the matter.

Export sales have helped the UK to retain essential capabilities at a time of a huge defence budget reduction and a reduction in the defence equipment market overall. The ECGD's work to underpin strategic industries in this country is extremely important.

It has been argued that the ECGD is not the right organisation to evaluate the development or ethical implications of defence exports. It does not have the expertise or the staff to carry out the necessary background research. That was recognised by the International Development Committee, which said:

"Criticisms of arms exports to particular countries and of the application of human rights criteria are being considered in detail"— in the course of its inquiry. It continued:

"ECGD should not have to second-guess or duplicate the system for the scrutiny of export licence applications."

We agree with that. Legitimate ethical and other matters should be considered in the scrutiny of licence applications, and they are not the primary responsibility of the ECGD.

The Conservative party is committed to a strong defence industry. We are conscious of the need to consider the impact of defence exports, particularly in the developing world, but such consideration can best be done through the licensing process, not through the deliberations of the ECGD.

The debate overall has clearly concerned a division between the Liberal Democrats and their friends in the Cabinet. I say to the Minister that, although the debate has clearly arisen from a philosophical divide, we, too, are concerned about the way in which the ECGD operates within the DTI.

I draw the Minister's attention to two points from the third report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. It says:

"There is some evidence of a lack of joined-up thinking between ECGD and parts of the DTI."

I do not know when the Minister intends formally to respond to the report. The report also states:

"One ex-underwriter stated that 'ECGD services are little understood within DTI and FCO'".

Those are criticisms by a Committee of the House, which has studied the matter in great detail. We want the ECGD to work effectively and to continue to underwrite risk, particularly in this important sector.

I should be grateful if the Minister, in his concluding remarks, assured us that those matters are being addressed and gave us a little more detail about how he evaluates the views of the Ministry of Defence and his Department in supporting our defence industries. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot and others have outlined what seem to be bogus remarks from the Foreign Office about the Government's so-called ethical foreign policy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate. We have heard interesting observations. I shall try in the few minutes left to answer some of the major questions, but first I must underscore the points made by the hon. Members for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) and for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) about the importance of the sector.

As someone who has lived through the death of a large industry—the coal industry—I know that such transformations are extremely difficult. A decade and a half later, we are still suffering the problems of transition. There is also a read-across, which no one has mentioned; for example, the ability to manufacture advanced aircraft has a read-across to civil aircraft.

I do not know whether the hon. Members for Twickenham and for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) are opposed to the production of civil aircraft. I do not know whether the Greens have leaned on them to that extent, or whether they have modified their policy. I should like to hear about that.

There has always been a read-across between industries. That is clear when one considers the great aircraft manufacturers, including Boeing and, in this country, British Aerospace. The Government are not about to surrender that industry, and we do not need to.

I want to clear up a couple of important points made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park in her passionate plea. No hon. Member, whether Liberal, Labour or anything else, has a monopoly on feeling passionate about the world being reconstructed rather than destroyed. I have young children, and I do not want them, or anyone else's children, to go through another war. The very notion that the Government's policy is contributing to an escalation of conflict in the world flies in the face of events.

I do not know who has been spinning against the DTI over recent months, but it irks badly. I notify all Departments of all licence applications that I receive. If those Departments want to comment on them, they can do so. I take no decision on any contract unless the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence have seen it. If the Department for International Development also wishes to comment on any licence application, it can do so.

It is untrue, for example, that DFID's advice on Eritrea licences was overruled. In the Government's response to the International Development Committee report, it is clearly stated that DFID's advice was not overruled on the cases identified by the Committee. I reinforce that point. The hon. Member for Richmond Park did not want to give way to me on that point, which was interesting. Perhaps she does not want the facts to get in the way of good rhetoric and a passionate story. If I were signing off deals that clearly breached human rights issues, and so on, I would find it very difficult to live in my house. My wife would know about it very quickly; the hon. Lady is not the only one to feel such passion.

Dr. Tonge: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development have never had reservations or objected to the granting of a licence that the DTI has then overruled?

Dr. Howells: If there are disagreements between Departments on any licence application, the matter goes to ministerial level and stays there until there is agreement. That is the way in which such matters ought to be sorted out: it is joined-up government and takes account of all the difficult issues concerning present, likely and marginal conflicts that are awkward to judge. The hon. Lady should have the good grace to understand that. She shakes her head, but clearly does not want to hear the truth. Very often, as politicians, we do not want to hear the truth, but I have just given it to this Chamber. DFID's advice is never ignored. I do not know who has been spreading the word that it has. I thought that it was perhaps from our own ranks, but it might be from the Liberal Democrats.

We have heard a great deal about the burden that the ECGD places on the taxpayer and the ways in which it is having to carry much of the finance that is made available to cover exports. That is not our reading of the situation. As the hon. Member for Twickenham said, there is a break-even clause. In fact, we expect ECGD to do a good deal more than break even.

I turn to the basis of the hon. Gentleman's case: the study at York university. The study was based on information that was several years out of date; made some heroic assumptions; averaged ECGD claims and assumed that defence business was in proportion, country by country, to civil business—but it was not. Past major claims markets, such as Nigeria, Poland and Brazil, involved very little—none in the case of Poland—defence business. Furthermore, in being so out of date, the study failed, in using the figure of £239 million, to take account of either the £1.6 billion received by ECGD in recoveries over the past three years or its vastly improved performance over the best part of the past decade. That is a very important point.

Let me now address the question whether ECGD gives defence business priority over other businesses. The decision on whether ECGD provides cover to a country is based on a risk assessment. If that assessment is favourable, cover is available on a first come, first served basis to all eligible exports, whether civil or defence. There have been no instances of defence business crowding out civil business. That point must be made, and clearly.

Two years ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that ECGD cover should be available only to 41 heavily indebted poor countries—HIPCs, as I learned last night—for exports that support their economic and social recovery and development. On 11 January, he announced the extension of the productive expenditure criteria—a wonderful phrase—to a further 22 countries. The UK's unilateral stance on the policy has not to date been followed. The hon. Member for Richmond Park should take that into account as well. She paid some tribute to it, but far from enough.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The Minister is extraordinarily brave to deal with this subject. What prospect has the UK ever had of selling arms to Vanuatu?

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman is quite right; he can have a poke at that one. Let me give him another. One of the countries on the initial HIPC list that I saw last night is Vietnam. That country very badly needs some arms to protect its exports and imports from pirates, gun-runners and smugglers. Are we to deny Vietnam exports? Of course we cannot. The country is on the list; the system is complicated: it is not black and white, as the hon. Members for Richmond Park and for Twickenham implied it was.

I am afraid that such real situations occur all too often in this world. I am not about to refuse to sign off such an agreement if it means that heroin will pour into this country from places such as Vietnam because it has been denied the ability to defend its trade, towns, estuaries and rivers from smugglers and pirates.

In the three remaining minutes, I shall turn to the two circumstances in which ECGD cover is denied. Under UK policy, those circumstances are, first, where it is clear that exports of particular goods should not be made to a country, and, secondly, where a country is assessed as unlikely to be able to pay. Any extension of those categories risks imposing our own views on other sovereign nations—an important point that nobody has mentioned in today's debate. Export credits are not aid but commercial loans that we expect to be paid in full and on time. It is not right for us, as a rich and powerful nation which is able to defend itself, to tell others who have a right to self-defence and security and can afford to pay that they cannot spend their money on those things.

Why does the ECGD rely so heavily on export licensing? If the UK decides that certain goods should not be exported to a country, the policy is enacted through the export licensing scheme. The presence of a valid export licence is a condition of ECGD cover. If a licence has been granted, the Government have no objection to the export and there is no reason for ECGD cover to be withheld.

I shall finish on the following point because I know that the next debate is about to begin. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry set up a review last year into the ECGD's mission status. It is expected to be concluded around Easter. I shall ensure that the views that have been expressed in this debate—a very useful debate—are put to that review. I do not wish to prejudge its outcome. I very much hope that hon. Members present will contribute to it because it is valuable and timely.

European Union Development Fund

11 am

On resuming—

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): This debate is timely, for two reasons. First, we now know the new structure for development within the European Commission: the former Danish Development Minister, Poul Nielson, is, by and large, the Development Commissioner for the European Union. In theory, that is a great improvement on the previous structure, whereby all sorts of Commissioners appeared to have responsibility for development in various parts of the world. The new arrangement should not only ensure consistency in the implementation of development policy in different parts of the world, but make it easier to tackle the issue of coherence between development policies and other community policies such as those on trade, agriculture and foreign policy.

However, the role of the External Affairs Commissioner, Chris Patten, needs to be explained. It is reassuring that he is well known to the House and that he has a development background in this country; but the confusion of external affairs and development has held back development, both in this country—under the previous structure whereby the Overseas Development Administration was part of the Foreign Office—and in Europe. Let me give an example. In May 1999, the Council of Ministers, the European Parliament and the Commission—that is, every part of the EU structure—reached agreement on the European Community budget. However, the agreement on the external budget did not acknowledge the EU commitment to tackle poverty in developing countries, even though that is prioritised in the EU's development co-operation objectives set out in the Maastricht treaty.

The second reason why the debate is timely is the successful conclusion of negotiations on the Lomé convention. I believe that this is the first opportunity that the Minister will have had to address hon. Members since the successful conclusion of the renegotiated Lomé agreement; I congratulate him on his role in that respect. I hope that he will take this opportunity to point out the gains to be derived by developing countries from Lomé. It is a great relief that Lomé did not become caught up in the Seattle debacle, although, at some stage, Lomé will have to be superseded by an arrangement that is World Trade Organisation-compliant. It is interesting to note the different scales of the publicity given to the successful conclusion of the Lomé negotiation and that given to events in Seattle.

The importance of the debate arises from the fact that 30 per cent. of our own aid money—British aid—is distributed by Europe; that figure has increased from 12 per cent. in 1980. The proportion of aid for which the EU is responsible has been rising all over Europe as the amount of aid has fallen. Because, by international treaty, we are pledged to give a certain amount to Europe and because Europe has been so inefficient in spending effectively, the fall in the sums devoted to aid—not in this country, but elsewhere—has been even more catastrophic. Sixty per cent. of development assistance in the world is given by the European Union, either collectively or by nation states. There is not the slightest chance of the world community meeting its ambitious anti-poverty targets—on reducing poverty and establishing universal primary education and universal access to reproductive health services—by 2015, unless Europe gets its act together. Up to now, the record has been very unsatisfactory and has cheated the poorest people in the world.

European Union development funding has been criticised for a multitude of reasons. First, there is no sense of co-ordination: there are multiple outlets for development or external assistance. Will that now stop? Secondly, there is confusion between development purposes and external affairs: EU activity has not been focused on poverty, and that trend has increased in recent years. Thirdly, there are huge delays between commitment of expenditure and its disbursement. If people are told that they have the money, they are well advised not to hold their breath while they wait for it; if they do, they might pass on before they receive it. That is not satisfactory.

Fourthly, there has been a substantial underspend, so that the large falls in aid that have occurred in recent years—not in this country—are made even worse by the sums committed not being spent.

Fifthly, the Commission and its staff have lacked the capacity or skills to disburse large sums of money, but have refused to decentralise to local offices. According to ActionAid, the European Union has only two gender experts and one education expert. How on earth can they deal efficiently with hundreds of projects? All that adds up to gross inefficiency, a lack of strategic vision, and a rising demand to return aid to nation states if matters do not improve. If matters do improve, there is a case for a large role for the EU. If European aid were administered effectively, everyone could gain.

Let me explore each of the issues that I have listed. What is the thinking behind the new European Union structure and what commitments has the new Commissioner given to improvement in terms of the focus on poverty? Development assistance is not skewed to the poorest countries, and that trend has been worsening. The most recent figures indicate that, leaving aside the special circumstances of the former Yugoslavia, the countries that receive most European aid are countries such as Morocco, Egypt, Tunisia, Jordan. Those are Mediterranean middle-income countries, not the poorest countries in the world; aid to sub-Saharan Africa barely registers.

There appears to be a chronic underfunding of Asia—the region in which the highest numbers of the poorest people live: 73 per cent. of the world's poorest people live in Asia. However, the European Union does not have a spending package spread over several years for Asia, unlike its programme for the countries covered by the Meda programme—measures to accompany the reform of economic and social structures in the framework of the Euro-Mediterranean partnership—or for sub-Saharan Africa. Instead, the EU budget for Asia is a yearly budget, which becomes squeezed.

What can the Minister tell us about the Meda programme for the Mediterranean and middle east, which ought to be reduced if the EU development budget is to be poverty focused? That programme also ought to be reduced because it underspends and the resources could be used elsewhere: in 1997, only 64 per cent. of allocated Meda funds were spent. I understand that Meda is being renegotiated and that a conclusion will be reached within the next few months. What stance are the British Government and other Governments taking on that failure to focus on the poorest countries in the world and on the inefficiency of the Meda programme?

What steps are being taken to make a much clearer division between development assistance and external assistance? That is a serious issue. The UK and the EU vote funds that are intended to contribute to the achievement of international targets on cutting poverty. That money should be spent on the poorest people in the poorest countries; unfortunately, much of it has been used for other political purposes. Some of those purposes have worthy goals on which money should be spent, but they should not be called development purposes. Let me quote a couple of examples. It is right that those countries that want to join the EU should be helped to adjust. Large funds have been made available through the Phare programme of Community aid for central and eastern European countries, and through the Tacis technical assistance programme for independent states of the former Soviet Union and Mongolia. Those countries trying to adjust their agriculture should be assisted through agriculture funds, which form the largest part by far of the EU budget. The money that we allocate to development should not be used for those purposes.

Similarly, in the case of the Meda budget, money is used to reduce immigration from the Mediterranean countries into the EU. That is understandable from the viewpoint of countries in southern Europe, but, again, it is not a development priority—it is a political goal.

What assurances can my hon. Friend the Minister give that, under the new structure, there will be a more scrupulous definition of development? I have no doubt that the importance of development and the quality of aid have been enhanced since the Department for International Development was established and escaped from the preoccupations of the Foreign Office. We should seek to achieve the same kind of independence in Europe.

Over the years, a surprisingly small amount of European Union aid has been allocated to social sectors such as health and education. Rising sums have been allocated within the EC, but we would be deluding ourselves if we thought that that has meant increased commitment to development for the poorest people in the poorest countries, both because of the underspending on those programmes—allocated resources budgeted by the member states but not used in that year by the Commission have led to a loss of resources for overseas development assistance amounting to 3 billion ecus per year—and because of the diversion of those funds to political funding, rather than development funding.

Although it is quality that matters, I welcome the assurance of the Commissioner that the next European development fund will allocate more to health care and that, as was stated in a letter to the Danish family planning association, there is likely to be an increased role for the European Union in the matters of reproductive health and population aspects of the third world. However, despite changes in policy rhetoric, more than 60 per cent. of Commission development funding is still spent on infrastructure projects—projects that may well be attractive to EU countries because of the money that they bring to European firms.

There are further important issues. I noted in the Lomé agreement negotiated by my hon. Friend the Minister that there were provisions to suspend development assistance where there was substantial corruption in the recipient country. That is a bold step forward and a welcome one. Can my hon. Friend give us more details?

Was there agreement within Lomé, and elsewhere in the EU, that there should be much more decentralisation of decision making to country offices, to end the appalling delays between the commitment of funds and their distribution? What progress is being made to end aid tying? I believe that there are substantial differences of opinion between member countries on this issue. Aid is given, with the specification that it must be spent on personnel or firms in the donor country.

At the ministerial summit meeting—presumably of the G8—in Okinawa, a move to untie aid is on the agenda. Will the EU agree that that should occur? Will we press for the untying of aid? Are we winning the struggle to ensure that aid is made more effective and that the needs of the recipients come first?

The EU development fund has tended to be project rather than strategy oriented. What steps are being taken to improve the quality of the work and the monitoring of that work? European development fund activities have tended not to be transparent, and not to involve the local community and civil society. What proposals are there for greater transparency and for capacity building and ownership to be at the centre of development?

I welcome the proposals that there should be short-term measures within Lomé to help countries whose revenues suddenly fall for reasons such as a collapse in commodity prices. That will be an improvement on the previous arrangements, such as Stabex—the stabilisation of export earnings. I particularly welcome the European Union commitments to providing duty free access to its markets to virtually all products from the least developed countries by 2005 at the latest. It is good that that will go ahead, despite the collapse of Seattle.

I should be grateful if the Minister would share his thoughts with us on how he sees Lomé gradually being integrated into the WTO world, as it must be, and if he would tell us more about European development funding and the changes that he helped to negotiate.

11.15 am

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) has delivered a serious indictment, but he is dreaming an impossible dream if he believes that the situation can be resolved. If the past is used as a guide to the future, the prognosis is grim. I am surprised that he has not called for the repatriation to our own country of decision making about the overseas aid budget.

We are speaking of British taxpayers' money. When we in the House could decide on expenditure and hold Ministers to account, we had much greater control over that money and could ensure to a much greater extent that it was well targeted and well invested.

Mr. Worthington: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there was less money every year?

Mr. Chope: As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, what is important is not the amount of money, but its effectiveness. Throwing money at a problem is not the same as solving it. More money is going into aid through the European Union, but, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is not achieving the desired results.

I agree wholeheartedly with comments made by the Secretary of State, for International Development particularly in her speech on 28 July last year. She called for a number of changes. I shall not recite them all, but one of her most important points was that we need a more effective poverty focus in allocating resources. She pointed out that the share of European Community assistance going to the poorest countries had fallen from 75 per cent. in 1987 to 50 per cent. in 1997, and said that that was a scandal. I agree. She said that she found it impossible to reconcile EU policy statements on poverty.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and hope I that am not interrupting his train of thought. What is his opinion of the intervention by the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington)? I have a table produced by the Department for International Development, showing the share of the DFID budget channelled through the European Community between 1980 and 1997. The hon. Gentleman is wrong. It was only in four years that the amount dropped. In the remaining years between 1980 and 1997, the amount of aid money going from Conservative Governments to the EC programme rose. Has my hon. Friend seen that table?

Mr. Chope: I have not, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing it to the attention of a wider audience. I, perhaps naively, took at face value the assertion made by the hon. Member for Clydebank. My hon. Friend has told me in no uncertain terms that I was at fault for doing that.

Mr. Worthington: So that we may draw the matter to the attention of an even wider audience, my point is that, when the Conservative party came into office, we were giving 0.51 per cent. of our gross domestic product to overseas development. When the Conservative party left office, that was down to 0.26 per cent. Because of the way in which the funds are disbursed, that would mean a larger amount going to Europe, but less going to the bilateral programme.

Mr. Chope: I recall that, when the Labour party was in opposition, it made all sorts of rash promises about increasing the proportion of gross domestic product that would be spent on aid. Those promises were never fulfilled to the people who were taken in by them.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I cannot refrain from putting in my oar. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that neither the Conservative Government nor the Labour Government made significant progress towards the internationally agreed 0.7 per cent. of GDP for international aid? Many of our Scandinavian partners have achieved that target.

Mr. Chope: The hon. Lady speaks for the party whose commitments to spending taxpayers' money know no bounds. She enthusiastically represents a party that believes in much higher personal and corporate taxation. I disagree with her about that. The money that taxpayers already contribute to aid programmes should be spent more effectively.

In her speech last July, the Secretary of State said that the United Kingdom, with Ireland, the Netherlands and Sweden, had asked the Commission to introduce proposals to increase the proportion of EU assistance to low-income countries every year from 2000 to 2006, reaching 70 per cent. by 2006. I hope that the Minister will tell us whether he is satisfied that that objective will be achieved.

The Secretary of State made approximately 10 recommendations in her speech. Her final recommendation was for a formal, published annual report. She said:

"The Commission should prepare a detailed, comprehensive report each year providing analysis and information on the EC's role in international development and detailing progress against agreed targets. Virtually all development agencies, from the World Bank to bilaterals and NGOs already do this. The report should cover all the external assistance programmes, and how our trade, investment and wider policies are contributing to our development goals. I would like the new Commission to agree to publish the first such report next year."

The need for such a report is apparent, not least because of the European Court of Auditors' continuing evidence of money going astray and not being accounted for, and non-compliance with the Commission's procedures.

Hon. Members who had the chance to peep at the Official Journal for 3 December 1999, which details the Court of Auditors' annual report for the financial year 1998, would have read a strong condemnation of the way in which the European Commission has run the programme and continues to fail to fulfil successive promises, made year after year, to try to put its house in order. My patience is running out. That is why I began my remarks by saying that we are dreaming an impossible dream if we believe that the Commission will provide an aid budget that is as effective as the budget that we could provide if it were under our control.

I shall not refer in detail to the range of criticisms and recommendations in the European Court of Auditors' report, but I shall provide a flavour of it. Paragraph 60 states:

"The Court has repeatedly drawn attention to the need for adequate accounting standards, policies and procedures to be established and consistently applied. The Commission continues not to apply consistently its accounting principles, which are explicitly mentioned in the financial statements and the accounting plans for the sixth, seventh and eighth EDFs."

What a serious indictment of the arrangements. That abuse has continued for years.

Paragraph 64 states:

"The accounts are qualified due to both the absence of a table of revenue and the incompleteness of the table of debts despite the disclosure of this information being defined in detail by the Financial Regulations"— which are set out in a series of articles—

"and furthermore in respect of the errors arising from the issues dealt with in paragraphs 65 to 67."

Paragraph 85 states:

"For 1998, even though the situation had improved since 1997, there was a significant incidence of formal errors across most instruments of the EDF."

Paragraph 79 states:

"Contrary to Article 311(1) of the Lomé IV bis Convention, the Commission did not appoint the Chief Authorising Officer of the eighth EDF, who is responsible for managing the resources of the EDF, until July 1999. This leads to a situation where all actions taken in 1998 which were to be taken by the Chief Authorising Officer, as well as those to be taken by all persons acting under subdelegation of powers, are not covered by the formal authorisation."

If Ministers or civil servants came before the Public Accounts Committee and admitted such errors, they would be forced to resign. I have described an intolerable position. The Commission remains arrogant beyond all bounds and takes the European Court of Auditors' criticisms inappropriately lightly. I hope that the Minister will explain why he has confidence, which I do not share, that the Commission will put its house in order.

The Official Journal for 29 September contains a special Court of Auditors report, numbered 499. That report gives many specific examples of non-payment or misappropriation of money that was allocated to the development programme for needy countries. I commend all those who naively believe that there is a way forward with the European Commission to consider those examples.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's line. He says that he has no confidence in the new Commission. He will recall that the old Commission resigned and was replaced. Does his lack of confidence extend to Chris Patten, a former Conservative Development Minister, who was very effective?

Mr. Chope: I do not totally lack confidence in him. However, the burden of my comments is that the system is so riddled with corruption that even someone as able as my noble Friend Lord Patten will be unable to cope with it.

Mrs. Gillan: Neil Kinnock, who is vice-president of the Commission, recently said that there was a new sense of responsibility in Brussels. Does my hon. Friend believe that the reports to which he referred are embarrassing to the vice-president of the new Commission?

Mr. Chope: Certainly. In my enthusiasm for Chris Patten, my former right hon. Friend, I ennobled him. I am sure that he will be ennobled in due course. That will be warmly welcomed by hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and me, if not by Labour Members. I hope that my admiration for the new Commissioner is not in doubt, but I despair that even he, with all his talents, will not be able to change the system. Doing that is of paramount importance.

[Mr. Chope]

I hope that the Minister will explain why he retains such confidence in the system, and why he does not believe that it would be far better if provision for aid was repatriated to this country so that the House could control it.

11.29 am

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on securing this debate. The issue is serious and deserves much more airing than it has received. However, the debate is developing into the usual scene—the Euro-sceptics descend, like a pack of hyenas on a corpse, as soon as anything bad is said about Europe. It is a sad little pack of hyenas this morning, but they are doing quite a good job. The matter is also of great interest and concern to the Europhiles, among whom I count myself. As a Liberal Democrat, I am a great supporter of the concept of the European Union.

Mrs. Gillan: I think that the hon. Lady would agree that it would be wrong to keep quiet when one reads such headlines as "Brussels wastes £18 million in Ivory Coast aid fraud". Also, she should withdraw her remarks about those who are anti everything about Europe and her description of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and me as hyenas. I hope that she understands that it is our right and duty to speak out against fraud and wastage, in particular when it involves money that is to go to the poorest people.

Dr. Tonge: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention. I described the Euro-sceptics descending like a pack of hyenas upon the corpse. If she wants to include herself in that description, she can, but I did not necessarily intend her to be a part of it.

I said that the matter was also of great concern to Europhiles. I am concerned and worried about the issue. The hon. Lady knows, because she has heard the story before, although I am going to repeat it, that my introduction to the problem was as a member of European Standing Committee B when it discussed a Court of Auditors report on European Community development aid to South Africa. I think that the hon. Lady has a copy.

I remember telling the Committee that I had sat down the night before with a glass of wine to read the report, expecting to be asleep in five if not 10 minutes. I did not take it seriously. However, I became crosser and crosser as I progressed through the report, which was a ghastly tale of inefficiency and ineffectiveness.

Given my medical experience, I was particularly affected by the fact that, in 1994, a lot of money had been earmarked for an HIV-AIDS prevention project in South Africa, but, by 1996, none of that money had been touched—the project had not even got off the ground. Now, the HIV-AIDS infection rate in South Africa is 25 per cent. One wonders how many of the present cases were due to that two-year delay—I expect that it would be several thousand in that part of Africa. That was disgraceful. That is one small example and we have heard many others from the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who has obviously done his homework well.

I have three questions. First, should we be spending one third of our aid budget on European aid, which goes to Europe to be spent with that from other European countries? The argument is always that it probably is a good idea because some projects are best done with small amounts of money by individual countries working alone, others are done much better by larger organisations such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the African Development bank or whatever, but European countries pooling together can be much more effective for some other projects than one country working alone. Therefore, we must agree than an argument can be made for effective European aid and working together.

My second question, with which the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie dealt well, is whether development aid is going to the right countries. The most up-to-date chart that I could find gives EC development aid by income group for the countries that receive European aid. In 1986-87, 50 per cent. of European aid went to the poorest countries but, by 1997-98, only 35 per cent. went to such countries. In 1997, Morocco was the biggest recipient of European aid, which had far more to do with French politics than with alleviating poverty.

The White Paper on the aims of development, which has never been debated but which was published by the Government in 1997—[HON. MEMBERS: "It has been."] I do not think that we have debated it, but the aim was to relieve poverty—the number of people living in poverty was to be halved by 2015. The European Union made a commitment to tackle poverty in the poorest countries, but it is not included in the Commission's Agenda 2000 proposal; nor is it in the financial outlook for 2000 to 2006. It seems to have been dropped altogether. However, I understand that that commitment to the relief of poverty was in the Maastricht treaty. I want to know where it has gone. The Minister must answer that question.

The Commission's agenda makes no reference to people living in extreme poverty, 75 per cent. of whom live in Asia; nor is there any reference to sub-Saharan Africa, which includes two thirds of the least developed countries. The emphasis has been switched to Europe's near neighbours: central and eastern Europe, the old Soviet bloc and the southern Mediterranean. We must try to bring the agenda back to the alleviation of poverty and the poorest people.

My third question is, is EU aid efficient? I do not need to reiterate that matter. I have seen an example in which it was wholly inefficient and the hon. Member for Christchurch gave us many other examples, so it clearly is not.

We should consider those questions and suggest solutions. First, we must have some sort of assurance that European aid has to be refocused on the least developed countries. The non-governmental organisations are suggesting that 70 per cent. of the financial perspectives—in the external actions budget—should go to the least developed countries. Our Government should be pushing for that.

Also, we must ensure that humanitarian emergency aid, which is always needed somewhere, is not reduced. We must keep up our contributions to such aid and it must be adequately protected in those financial perspectives to meet all the United Nations appeals for relief, which happen every year, year in and year out.

My third suggestion is that the three directorates in the European Union that all deal with development issues cause terrible confusion and delay. Problems are tossed between the directorates. They must be streamlined into one and I think I see the Minister assuring me that they have been.

Is monitoring and reporting back sufficiently frequent and accurate? Do we know where the money is going? The report by the Court of Auditors that was considered in the European Standing Committee that I mentioned—some of us were members of that Committee—was for 1986 to 1996, but we were discussing it three years later at the end of 1999. That is no good: that is not the efficient monitoring of projects. It is ridiculous. We need to monitor the situation on a yearly or even a six-monthly basis.

Furthermore, if aid is to be combined and the money is to come from all the countries in the European Union, one member country could be targeted as the lead country for a project. It could be financially responsible as well as responsible for setting up the project, taking it through and reporting back to the EU and member states on how it was progressing. I do not see any other way to manage projects efficiently. A key group of people has to work on them and be in overall control. At the moment, the system is chaotic. Having a lead country for every project would help considerably.

If the present muddle continues and, in three years, another European Standing Committee B is considering another Court of Auditors report and we are all sitting around stroking our beards and agonising about how inefficient things have been, I for one will begin to think that we should indeed suspend our contributions until the European Union can get its act together.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on obtaining a debate on this worthwhile subject, and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on their contributions.

I am delighted that our proceedings are being observed by the Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), who has joined us from Select Committee business, which shows how important the subject is, particularly to Conservative Members, although hon. Members on both sides of the House show a great deal of interest and concern for the subject.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie did not roll over and take an ameliorating line with the Minister, and I was delighted to hear him pose many questions to which I hope the Minister will reply. I am sure that the Minister is delighted to have such a generous amount of time in which to deal with the serious issues that have been raised. That commonality is to be welcomed, but there are some hard questions to which he must respond. This is a probing debate, in the spirit of a probing amendment.

I have the most sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, who made a valuable contribution. He described the hon. Member for Clydebank as dreaming the impossible dream. Like him, I too, am surprised that the hon. Gentleman stopped short of calling for the repatriation of funds. The hon. Member for Richmond Park certainly gave the impression that she was calling for the repatriation of funds, or moving towards calling for that as a result of the evidence that she had received.

Whether our contributions to the EC have diminished or decreased over the years, they remain high. The expenditure profile of total contributions to the EC range from £533 million in 1997-98 to £760 million in 1998-99 and £750 million in 1999-2000. Of that total, the European development fund received £137 million in 1997-98, £228 million in 1998-99 and just under £250,000 in the current financial year. As the hon. Member for Clydebank said, those are sizeable sums. They have risen from 12 per cent. to more than 30 per cent. as a proportion of the total aid spend. Such sums must be effective and properly scrutinised.

I understand that the United Kingdom has a backlog of payments for Stabex under the EDF totalling about £65 million, which I believe it has been agreed with the Commission will be paid over future years. I should be grateful if the Minister would give us an update of the position and fill us in on that particular annotation.

The Department produced a document entitled "Working in Partnership with the European Community, in December 1998, which I read with care, and with some of which, like others, I can agree. It states:

> "DFID wishes to strengthen its collaboration with the EC in order to improve the quality and effectiveness of efforts to promote international development."

No one can quarrel with that. However, I hope that the Minister will tell us how DFID has strengthened its collaboration with the EC and what progress has been made on that valuable aim, where that has taken us and how it has manifested itself.

The document also states that

> "patchy implementation of project cycle management techniques impairs the quality of the Commission's programmes. These difficulties are reinforced by inappropriate staffing, and systems which centralise most authority in Brussels. It is important to note that weaknesses in the EC's programmes arise partly from constraints imposed by member states."

Will the Minister update us on what action has been taken to remedy the inappropriate staffing, who has been moved on, retired or fired, who has been taken on and with what expertise, what detailed constraints have been imposed by member states and what efforts have the Government made to persuade other member states to change those constraints? What success have the Government had on that agenda? There is no doubt that the difficulties and the lack of accountability are causing great concern, as has been reflected in all of today's contributions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch referred to the recent Court of Auditors' annual report, published on 3 December 1999, and I make no apologies for doing the same. I see the Minister nod. I hope that he does so because he is intimately familiar with the document. I assume great knowledge on his part and I am sure that I am not mistaken.

I am extremely concerned by that report, including the Commission's responses, which overall give the impression of much complacency. What action has the Minister taken following receipt of that report? What are his views on the Commission's responses and what does he see as the way forward to deal with an increasingly difficult problem?

Chapter 2, paragraph 7, on technical co-operation, states:

"In 1996, the Court carried out an audit of technical cooperation activities . . . the results of which were communicated to the Commission by early 1997."

More alarmingly, the report said:

"In the follow-up inquiry, carried out on a number of aspects of technical cooperation, it was found that in most cases the problems identified earlier were still persisting."

Obviously, no effective action has been taken in that case.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Lady tell me again what year that was?

Mrs. Gillan: The report was published on 3 December 1999 and I was referring to chapter 2, paragraph 7, on technical co-operation. The audit was carried out in 1996 and was communicated in 1997, but no action was taken. I hope that the Minister will be able to allay my fears on that.

Similarly, paragraph 23 on regional co-operation under the sixth EDF, states:

"Nothing had been done in response to the Court's observation that a report needs to be submitted to the discharge authority every year on the overall implementation of regional cooperation and on the state of progress of and adjustments to the RIPs."

I hope that the Minister will also address his mind to that comment and consider whether any action that he has taken could result in an improvement in performance in that area.

Paragraphs 30 and 31 relate to putting works contracts out to tender. Paragraph 31 is a short simple sentence, but it reflects the worsening performance of the organisation. It states:

"The Court has not obtained any information which indicates improvement in this area."

Despite criticisms and constructive suggestions, there have been no improvements. That, Mr. Deputy Speaker, seems to be a pattern that is being constantly repeated.

The Chairman (Dr. Michael Clark): Order. It is pleasant to be called Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am not an appointed Deputy Speaker, although Mr. Winterton, who follows me, is. Therefore, while I am in the Chair, it would be better to address me by my name.

Mrs. Gillan: I apologise, Dr. Clark. I thought that you had been elevated to great station. I shall continue to refer to you by name.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch pointed out the qualifications of the audit, but it is worth looking at the summary of the Court of Auditors report. No table of revenue was included and the table of debts was incomplete, despite being an explicit requirement of the financial regulations. He referred to two other matters: in respect of the eighth EDF, the chief authorising officer as well as all persons with sub-delegated powers had acted without being covered by formal authorisation and the audit showed a significant number of formal errors. In addition, the audit showed a high incidence of failures to comply with regulations affecting the assigned funds of the eighth EDF and often indicated both a failure properly to apply control procedures and—where no direct effect on the amount involved in the transaction was identified—formal errors. The court's audit again revealed a significant incidence of formal errors affecting the primary commitments and continuous substantive errors, as evidenced in the summary.

What sort of confidence can we have in an organisation that is responsible for taking taxpayers' money and distributing it on their behalf to the poorest around the globe when an audit report carries such severe indictments? I said in an intervention that we have a duty to challenge what happens when we see headlines such as "Brussels wastes £18 million in Ivory Coast aid fraud". A newspaper reports that, according to a document seen by it, was paid. The document is highly critical of the European Community team that was in-country, but none of its members will face disciplinary action.

"up to 37 times the market price for health equipment such as stethoscopes and baby scales"

I hope that the Minister will tell us whether he has called for a full investigation and disciplinary action and his reaction to what has been described as a scandal that "represents the worst single abuse of aid funds in European Union history."

These events are embarrassing for the new Commission vice-president, Neil Kinnock, who only a couple of weeks ago promised a "new sense of responsibility" in Brussels spending. What is the Minister's assessment of whether this matter could lead to further resignations of Commissioners? After all, 20 resigned last March after disclosures of fraud and mismanagement. The report goes on to say that local companies in the Ivory Coast had for almost a decade without Brussels noticing. Most of the missing money was intended to boost the African state's health sector. Perhaps he will join me in condemning that corruption and give me the reassurance I need that he is hot on the trail of rooting out such examples of fraud and corruption.

"routinely over-billed and produced false bills"

I have obtained a list, which runs to 12 pages, of projects that are in line for future funding from the EDF. I am sure that the Minister is familiar with them and hope that he will tell hon. Members—perhaps not during the debate, but by placing evaluations in the Library—his view of the individual projects that have been suggested. Following reports such as the audit to which I have referred, there will be a great deal of concern about the way in which money is spent. We need to know our own Government's attitude towards the proposal to spend 18 million euros on environmental and human resources development programmes in Fiji. Those programmes may be worth while, but I want our Government to make a detailed evaluation of all projects that are suggested, whether for Jamaica, Kenya, Mauritius, Mauritania, Mali or Mozambique. I hope that he feels able to respond on each project, stating our Government's view on whether it is worth while.

In a speech on 28 July 1999, the Secretary of State said:

"The question is always, will the money be better spent directly by member states or through the EDF. The EDF money is not additional. If the instruments of the EDF are ineffective it is obviously better spent directly by member states."

I hope that the Minister will tell us to where the Secretary of State's thinking has moved since she made that speech. Is she now of the view that the instruments of the EDF are ineffective and does she believe that the money would be better spent directly by the member states? She went on:

"I want to hear the EC praised for its speed and efficiency, not criticised for delay and bureaucracy. I want to be confident that the quality of all the EC's programmes will be lifted up to the standard of its best ones."

Sadly, those are impossible dreams and that has clearly not happened with the EDF.

I shall be generous with the time that I leave for the Minister. We need to know what steps have been taken to establish real accountability and his assurance that the fine words, which have been echoed by him and the Secretary of State, are being followed through with action. We need greater transparency and we must ensure that the money that the British taxpayer gives to Brussels to spend on the poorest in society is spent effectively, not wasted in fraud and corruption.

11.57 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): This is my first opportunity to reply on behalf of the Government to a debate in the new environment of Westminster Hall, which takes some getting used to as we have seen this morning. This is also my first debate under your distinguished chairmanship, Dr. Clark, and it is a great privilege to participate. I have known you for many years and co-operated closely with you on all-party matters.

Other hon. Members have referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) as the hon. Member for Clydebank, but I am able to pronounce his constituency perfectly and can give him his full title. Like others, I congratulate him not only on obtaining the debate, but on seeking it in the first place and on the commitment and concern he has shown over many years. I am glad that he is a member of the International Development Committee. Its Chairman—the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells)—is also present and I am sure he agrees that my hon. Friend makes a significant and positive contribution. For the benefit of readers of our proceedings, I should say that he is nodding.

In Lisbon last week, I had the pleasure of attending the informal meeting of Development Ministers—the informal Development Council—which focused principally on the role of the European Union in security, democracy and development in Africa. All the discussions and all the other Development Ministers present reminded me once again of not only the importance but the current weaknesses, of EU development assistance, which have been eloquently described by others. I notice that hon. Members quoted extensively from the Secretary of State's speech, so I am sure that they will acknowledge that the Government have been on the job on this matter. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) referred to that. Above all, we focused on the steps that need to be taken to maximise the potential of all the European Union programmes to eliminate poverty. That potential is there, but it needs to be realised, as the Government recognise and have for the two and a half years of their lifetime.

Mrs. Gillan: I assure the Minister that I am not going to become part of a mutual admiration society. I quoted from the Secretary of State's speech because I wanted to know what progress had been made. Hon. Members need to know that this is not all hot air.

Mr. Foulkes: Hon. Members will know what progress has been made when I can make progress with my speech.

I remind the hon. Lady that our White Paper was the first development White Paper for more than 20 years. In all the years of their existence, the last Government never produced one. In our White Paper, we said that the single biggest challenge the world faced in the new millennium was that one in four of our fellow human beings was living in extreme poverty. That is an awful indictment.

In a series of United Nations conferences in the last decade, all the Governments of the world have committed themselves to a series of targets for poverty eradication. We cannot alleviate awful, grinding poverty by sticking plaster will help. Such poverty must be reduced, and ultimately eradicated. The main goal is to halve the proportion of the world's population living in such abject poverty by 2015. Associated targets include universal primary education, access to basic health care and reproductive health care for all, and sustainable development plans, including commitments to reverse the loss of environmental resources in every country.

Those targets were agreed in all those international conferences. It is this British Government who have taken them off the shelf, dusted them down and placed them at the forefront of our policy. The contents of our White Paper have been taken up by other countries throughout the world.

I remind the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) that a statement made in the House of Commons on 5 November 1997—I hope that she was present—provided an opportunity for all sorts of questions to be raised about the White Paper. There have been opportunities to discuss it throughout the country in various forums, and it has been discussed in the Select Committee. We have not shrunk from discussing the White Paper and all its aspects, including international development targets, either in Parliament or outside.

Dr. Tonge: Does the Minister recall that, at the time of the statement to which he referred, the Secretary of State assured me that the aims of the White Paper were fully supported and applauded by every Department?

Mr. Foulkes: Absolutely. I shall follow that up shortly.

The international development targets are practical and achievable, but to achieve them we need to generate the political will, mobilise the resources and adopt the right policies, not just in this and every other bilateral donor country but internationally. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made an announcement last week—she was going to do so in oral questions, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you and your colleagues managed to ensure that that was not possible—[HON. MEMBERS: "Not true."] She therefore made the announcement in the form of a written answer. She said that the Government planned to produce a second development White Paper—as I said, none were produced in the lifetime of the last Government—that would place the challenge of globalisation at the heart of our development policy. There would be no change in direction, but our work would feature a greater depth and more detail. I hope and expect that there will be a great deal of consultation before and after the publication of the White Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie emphasised the importance of European Community development assistance to meeting the challenges that I have described. The statistics speak for themselves, and are worth repeating. The EC is the world's second largest multilateral donor, spending approximately 5 billion euro each year. Together with the bilateral programmes of its member states, the European Union provides two thirds of global development assistance. That is a formidable amount. Through our Department, the United Kingdom contributes about 15 per cent. of EC aid resources, which, as my hon. Friend said, take up about 30 per cent. of our budget.

Incidentally, the percentage was agreed at a European summit in Edinburgh, where I received my university education, in 1992. It was not my party that was in power at the time.

Let me tell the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) that—as my hon. Friend pointed out—in 1979 United Kingdom development assistance amounted to 0.52 per cent. of gross national product. Under the last Government, it fell to 0.26 per cent. What the hon. Gentleman does not realise is that it is now on its way back up, surely and steadily. It is now at 0.28 per cent., and we intend to go even further. The hon. Gentleman is out of date in that regard, and I regret to say that some of his other comments were based on out-of-date facts and perceptions.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister tell us the Government's present target for aid as a percentage of gross domestic product? Does it differ from the pledges given before the last general election?

Mr. Foulkes: We have adopted the United Nations target of 0.7 per cent. of GNP, and we aim to move towards that figure steadily. Indeed, we have already done so: each year we have shown that we are moving up. We shall move up next year and the year after that, and throughout the 15 or 20 years of Labour government.

Mrs. Gillan: Obviously the Minister is backing his commitment to move towards the 0.7 per cent. target, but he must surely agree that the words he utters are meaningless unless he gives us a timetable. Will he put us all out of our misery, and tell us in which year the Labour Administration will achieve the target? We need to know the year now.

Mr. Foulkes: What a familiar question. I could have predicted it. I did not have it written down, but I had it in my head.

Of course we will achieve the target as quickly as possible, and the fact is that we are already moving up. I can tell the hon. Lady that, if we had continued at the level established by the last Government, by 2020 we would not be spending anything on development assistance.

If we are to meet the international development targets, we must deploy the full potential of the international system, and that includes the European Community. As everyone has said, however, the effectiveness of EC development assistance is far below its potential. Independent evaluations have highlighted a range of problems. Too much effort has been focused on spending and input, and not enough on achieving an impact and monitoring it. The Community lacks an overall and coherent development policy, which means that decisions have no clear development focus. As a result, a decreasing share of EC development assistance has been going to the poor countries—54 per cent. in 1997, compared with 75 per cent. 10 years earlier.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park asked for a target. We accept that a minimum of 70 per cent. should be our target for assistance to the less developed countries: that is what we are achieving in Britain, and we want to increase it. Most other member countries are doing the same, and we think it sensible for the EC to adopt that policy.

The major recipients of EC aid, which a decade ago were the poor countries in Africa and Asia, are now—as the hon. Member for Richmond Park pointed out—the better-off countries of the southern Mediterranean, and poverty has not diminished in those poorer countries. These trends seriously impair the EC's contribution to the international poverty eradication strategy.

There have been references to the report of the European Court of Auditors. We welcome the report. The Court of Auditors is a good and careful watchdog and monitor of what is happening with the expenditure of the Commission and what is happening in the Community. It makes valuable recommendations for improvements. We need these criticisms to highlight weaknesses and to enable us to know what we have to tackle. It is wrong, however, to say that it is only in the Commission that there is fraud or misappropriation that needs checking.

For example, the Public Accounts Committee discovers certain things that are happening in the United Kingdom from time to time. France, Germany and other member states have not been without their own problems. The Europhobes, who are so paranoid about Europe, think that things go wrong only within the European bureaucracy, but they go wrong within member states.

It has been said that given what has been revealed in the Court of Auditors report, the members of the Commission should resign. That is precisely what they did, in an entirely unprecedented act. The entire Commission resigned following scandals and revelations. It was the right decision. A new Commission was appointed, which gives the EU a chance to make radical improvements to its development programmes, which we believe it is starting to do.

There have been two main changes. First, instead of five Commissioners responsible for different aspects of development, there are now only two. That is a great improvement. The two are Poul Nielson, the former Danish development Minister, who is now the Commissioner for Development and Humanitarian Aid, and Chris Patten, a former Conservative development Minister, who is the new Commissioner for External Relations. We welcome the simplification and we welcome also the two appointments for the personal qualities that each individual brings to the job.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give the House his view on whether anybody should take responsibility for the £18 million that has gone missing in the Ivory Coast? I hope that you will think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this is a good time to raise the issue. I would like the hon. Gentleman's comments on Georgio Cocchi, who runs the Ivory Coast desk in Brussels, who has said that £18 million "is a negligible amount, you must remember that it forms part of a budget of around £70 million annually."

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a serious amount, and that people must be held accountable and removed from their positions if they cannot account for £18 million?

Mr. Foulkes: I intended to mention the matter later but I shall do so now. I raised the matter at the Development Council meeting at Lisbon. Poul Nielson told me that the money has been returned and that the matter has been and is being dealt with.

Poul Nielson is responsible for development issues worldwide and Chris Patten is responsible for political relations world wide. As we know from our own experience, successful development policy depends on having a clear and strong development focus, and then working closely with our colleagues who are responsible for political relations, trade policy and international finance, for example. It is what we describe as coherence.

Both Poul Nielson and Chris Patten have stated publicly their commitment to poverty eradication. I know that they work closely together, and that is essential. Although Poul Nielson has global development responsibilities, direct control of non-Lomé aid and the programmes for central and eastern Europe, Latin America and Asia are with Chris Patten. However, both Commissioners are determined to tackle the procedures for implementing the Community's programmes, which remain slow and inefficient. They are reviewing all of the arrangements that are currently in place with a view to improving them.

Mr. Chope: The Minister asserts that as a result of the resignation of the previous Commission, everything is now hunky dory. How is that consistent with the Commission's complacent reply to the special report No. 4/99 of the Court of Auditors, which was published on 29 September 1999, which states:

"The Commission considers that its financial management information system provides all the necessary information"?

It goes on to make a complacent statement.

Mr. Foulkes: I did not say that everything is now hunky dory. I said quite the reverse. I said that things are improving but much more needs to be done. I will continue saying that.

That brings me to the second main change following the appointment of the new Commission—the commitment to reform. Chris Patten and Poul Nielson can make some progress within the systems for which they are directly responsible, but some changes must be made throughout the Commission. That is why Neil Kinnock's proposals for reforming the financial and staff management of the Commission are so important and need to be implemented. We need fundamental changes in financial procedures—such as delegation of authority to local officers and more rational audit arrangements—that will improve financial responsibility and cut unnecessary delays. It is not enough to design good aid programmes if they are delivered too late to address the problems that they are meant to tackle. The hon. Member for Christchurch cannot say that I am claiming that everything is hunky-dory.

We also need fundamental improvements in staff management in the Commission so that it can develop the skills that are needed to design and deliver modern aid programmes. The Commission needs to be able to meet the standards which other developing agencies, including my Department, have set. I tell the hon. Member for Richmond Park that we have seconded 20 officials to the Commission to help to improve its efficiency and effectiveness.

The new Commission is a crucial opportunity for improvement. The key Commissioners have strong development backgrounds and the Commission as a whole is committed to reform. We support it and urge it to carry this reform through as quickly as possible. However, we are not complacent. Change is always difficult and our job is to scrutinise the Commission's actions as much as its words, and to maintain the pressure for the improvements that we all know are needed.

It is important to recognise, however, that the Commission, member states and the European Parliament share responsibility for past failures due to the pressure to reach spending targets irrespective of impact, the pressure to spend in the spheres of interest of individual member states and procedural constraints that make it impossible to respond quickly and efficiently. We, too, share the responsibility for making improvements. As the House and the Select Committee on International Development know, the Government have been working with the Commission and other member states to improve the quality and effectiveness of EC development assistance. My Department published a strategy paper—it has not been much quoted and I hope that Members have read it—on this issue in December 1998. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out a number of proposals in a speech in Brussels last July. I know that Members have read her speech because they have quoted from it. We have made some progress in achieving our objectives, but there is still a long way to go.

I agree that we must all work strenuously to secure a clear development policy for the EU which is focused on poverty eradication, and not on using precious aid budgets for political gestures, as has been done in the past. We must all work to equip the Commission with the skills and the systems that it needs to manage the EC aid budget properly, and to deliver real change on the ground in poor countries. We must all work also to co-ordinate more effectively our development programmes—that applies not only to the EC but to World bank and bilateral programmes—in a way that puts the needs of developing countries first, rather than the short-term interests of companies and contractors in our own countries. We will take on board the suggestion of the hon. Member for Richmond Park about one-country lead. That has already been considered by the European Community and it is something that we would like to consider. I am grateful to her for raising the matter.

We must seize every opportunity to maximise the contribution of EC development assistance to the goal of poverty eradication. One such opportunity is to redress the imbalance in non-Lomé EC aid. European Union Foreign Ministers agreed last July that the Commission should table proposals for the overall allocation of the EC non-Lomé aid budget across the various regional spending programmes for the next seven years. That is a great improvement. It would allow Ministers to discuss EC development priorities as a whole. Without these proposals, regional allocations will be agreed individually and there will be no improvement in the EC's poverty focus. First come, first served is a bad method for setting a global policy. We are asking the Commission to come up quickly with proposals for an overall examination of the EC's development spending.

Hon. Members have mentioned the disproportionate amount of EC aid that goes to richer countries. EC Mediterranean programmes, known as MEDA, warrant particular attention, as my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie said, as they receive one of the largest allocations of aid commitments. However, as Commissioner Patten has acknowledged, the Commission has been unable to spend, and the recipient countries unable to absorb, more than an embarrassingly small fraction of those commitments, thus locking funds that could have been spent on more poverty-focused programmes in Asia and sub-Saharan Africa. That matter is being looked at.

My hon. Friend rightly asked what the British Government and other member states are doing to reduce MEDA funding. As our objective is to increase the proportion of EC aid to the poorest countries, we believe that MEDA funds should be reduced. We have argued and are arguing strongly for improvements to the development quality of MEDA programmes. Several other member states share our concerns and support us, particularly Sweden, the Netherlands and Germany.

My hon. Friend rightly objects to the move by the Commission to use MEDA funds to combat migration. That is not a proper use of development money. I assure him and other hon. Members that we are opposing that strongly within the EU Councils. Again, we have support from other member states. We are arguing for any such expenditure to be excluded from all development budgets.

As I have said, instead, we need a comprehensive development policy for the Commission that commits us to working with the international community to meet the development targets. The policy should therefore focus on poverty eradication and should call for a coherent approach across all EC policies, including international trade, agriculture, fisheries and others, so that they do not undermine the EU's development policy. Commissioner Nielson is due to table a draft development policy next month for discussion with EU member states and with civil society. That is a big step forward. I hope that Members realise that and that strong voices, here and elsewhere, will scrutinise the Commission proposal in detail.

We need the underpinning structure and procedures in the Commission, so that it can implement our policy effectively and efficiently. Whatever the successes of EC aid in the past, they have been overshadowed by the appalling delays in implementation. The effect has been to minimise the impact of European aid and has led some developing countries even to reject EC money.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of aid untying for the least developed countries. Discussions on that are continuing in the OECD development assistance committee. A large majority of DAC members are agreed on measures to be taken. However, one or two members still have reservations. I assure him and other hon. Members that we will continue to work for agreement at the DAC high-level meeting in May. It will then be possible to report to the G8 Okinawa summit, as he requested, that a successful outcome has been reached, in line with the wishes expressed at the two previous G8 summits.

Mr. Worthington: The key issue is the definition of development. My hon. Friend may not be able to give the answer today, but if there is to be purity and quality in European development, external affairs and development will have to be separated. It is legitimate, for example, to support the middle east peace process, but that should not be categorised as development. Will there be a redefinition of what in the European budget counts as development money?

Mr. Foulkes: That is exactly the sort of comment that can be made in the consultation on Poul Nielson's paper. We will examine that matter.

I come to one of the more positive stories of EC development assistance—there are positive stories—the successor to the Lomé convention. I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about my small part in it. Negotiations are not quite complete. They started in 1998 and were almost concluded last December, but, as I speak, Ministers from African, Caribbean and Pacific countries as well as the EU are meeting in Brussels to tie up the loose ends of the new convention. I hope that it will be agreed today and tomorrow.

As hon. Members know, Lomé is a unique collaboration, covering trade, development and political co-operation between the EU and the 71 ACP countries. The current negotiations mark the most important revision of the convention since its inception nearly three decades ago. The Select Committee on International Development looked at both Lomé and the general EC budget spending on development in 1998 and made a number of helpful recommendations. The Government have been pursuing those and other points in the negotiations.

I am pleased to report significant improvements in the new convention, which will benefit developing countries. They are a direct focus on poverty elimination as the convention's overriding objective; reform of the financial management of the EDF; abolition of the complex and slow procedures—I expect a cheer—notably Stabex and Sysmin, which will be replaced by a new system to provide support to countries whose development efforts are compromised by a downturn in export revenue; and more up-to-date management of development assistance.

In exchange for those improvements, there will be an ample replenishment of the EDF. The importance of good governance is highlighted by making it a "fundamental element" underpinning the new convention. Civil society's role in the convention has been enhanced. For the first time, it will be possible to take action in cases of severe corruption. That could include suspending countries from the convention and will work in the same way as for breaches of the convention's "essential elements"—human rights, democracy and the rule of law. So far, under that rule, development assistance has been partially suspended for four countries that have suffered coups d'etat.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that those are significant steps forward, which have been agreed by the British Government, who have pursued recommendations from the International Development Committee, argued the case effectively in Brussels, secured the agreement of other countries, and worked effectively within Europe as a powerful voice.

The new convention, necessarily, does not detail how development co-operation will be implemented. That is the function of a separate agreement between EU member states, which we shall discuss over coming months. We will push for increased decentralisation of authority from Brussels to improve the speed and quality of delivery.

I know that the Commission, which is well aware of current problems, wants to do that, too. We will continue to encourage the Community increasingly to provide its assistance in the context of government-led, joint-donor programmes, rather than stand-alone projects.

One of the most important aspects of the new convention and the one that has involved the most difficult negotiations is a new trade deal that maximises African, Caribbean and Pacific countries' access to the EU market, while promoting their gradual integration into the global economy. The preferential trading arrangements will be maintained until 2008, after which new World Trade Organisation-compatible arrangements will come into effect. Those will be free trade agreements between groups of ACP countries and the EU, but they will initially allow mainly non-reciprocal access to the EU market. To allow ACP countries time to adjust, fully reciprocal free trade would not be expected until probably 20 years from now.

One of the British Government's concerns in the negotiation has been countries that are not able to join those free trade areas in 2008. Two important commitments have been secured. Lesser developed countries—the poorest countries—will benefit from the EU's commitment to allow duty-free access for, effectively, all their products by 2005. For other, more developed countries, the EU has undertaken to examine all possibilities to provide a new, WTO-compatible trading framework with benefits equivalent to those under the current convention.

ACP and EU Ministers have agreed that the EDF will be used to make a substantial contribution to the heavily indebted poor countries initiative. A total of 1 billion euro from previously unspent EDF funds is being made available for debt relief for the poorest and most indebted countries in Africa. It is an ill wind that blows no one any good.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for International Development have been leading the world in debt cancellation. The money released must be used for poverty eradication, education, health, water and sanitation.

[Mr. Foulkes]

This has been a good debate. I hope that hon. Members will agree that the Government are moving in the right direction—the direction that all hon. Members who spoke in the debate have encouraged us to take.

Peach Report

12.30 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I should preface my remarks by declaring an interest, as a solicitor—but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department will be pleased to know that I have no immediate plans to apply for judicial appointment. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor would be unlikely to appoint me even if I were to apply.

I certainly do not intend to repeat arguments that I have made before—on what has become quite a well-worn issue—in debates on the Access to Justice Act 1999 and, in the past year, on the number of judges, but it is important that we should put Sir Len Peach's report in context. The context includes the need to maintain judicial standards and to maintain impartiality and independence, particularly with the advent of the Human Rights Act 1998 cases that are likely to be appearing before the courts: cases on devolution; the increasing use of judicial review; straightforward political cases, such as that of Pinochet; and wider issues of judicial interests dealt with recently by the Court of Appeal.

We have to try to obtain a more representative Bench, reflecting society. It is a disgrace that, currently, only seven of 98 High Court judges are women, and that none of them are from an ethnic minority background. Since May 1997, of the 85 judges appointed, fewer than 10 per cent. were women, and only one judge was from an ethnic minority background. There is also a real disparity in appointments between solicitors and barristers.

Against that background, we shall have to do much to restore public confidence. Public confidence is currently at an all-time low, as evidenced by last year's research by the Nuffield Foundation showing that the general public view judges as being overwhelmingly out of touch.

I certainly welcome the establishment of the inquiry by Sir Len Peach into judicial and Queen's Counsel appointments. The Lord Chancellor must be congratulated on making the report possible—although the inquiry will have to be given two, rather than three, cheers. It is a pity that Sir Len's terms of reference did not include an opportunity to examine some of the more structural and fundamental problems in appointments. Nevertheless, I very much welcome Sir Len's work and the opportunity that I had to meet him and contribute my views to the debate.

The scope of Sir Len's report is important. For the first time, there was a clear recognition of the distinction between the skills needed for advocacy and those needed to be a judge. I was very pleased to read the comments of my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor, in his press notice, welcoming Sir Len's report:

"the best advocates do not necessarily make the best judges. Today's judges need to be able to meet the demands of managing cases and to have the personal skills needed to run a court, as well as being first-class lawyers."

My right hon. Friend went on to say:

"The skills and experience needed to be a judge may perfectly well be shown by a successful litigation solicitor as by a leading advocate".

I should add parenthetically that, in the new world of the Woolf reforms and the new civil justice rules, I suspect that, certainly when it comes to case management, solicitors may have more of the required skills than barristers do.

As for Sir Len's detailed recommendations, he starts off by tackling the most contentious issue: secret soundings. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister denies that secret soundings exist—he said so in answer to a parliamentary question; he prefers a rather longer definition of the process—but, perhaps simply as shorthand, I may use the term. I think that we agree on what we are talking about, even if we do not necessarily agree on the terminology.

Sir Len has not tackled secret soundings head on, but operated within the context of his terms of reference. Nevertheless, he has presented some ideas to mitigate some of the worst effects of the process—or as he describes it, to level the playing field—by suggesting that applicants could nominate their own referees, whose opinions would be weighted accordingly in the overall scheme of things. It is also important that secret soundings documentation will now concentrate much more on the skills requirement of the post, rather than on hearsay gossip, as previously feared.

I was very pleased to see Sir Len taking on some very experimental and far-thinking ideas—particularly his suggestion to establish an assessment centre, where putative judges could be interviewed, and where there could be group exercises and discussions, such as in-tray equivalents, tests, presentations and the need to train assessors for those purposes.

I particularly welcome Sir Len's proposal on psychometric competency testing, to ensure that those whom we appoint to judicial office are temperamentally suited to the position. As one who has occasionally appeared in cases in which I may have questioned the judge's personality, I very much welcome the proposal. Moreover, as one who made the suggestion to Sir Len, I am pleased that he has taken it on board.

I ask the Minister whether the Government will take on board the suggestion to establish assessment centres and testing. If they accept the suggestion, when will centres be established?

I have long advocated the establishment of a judicial appointments commission, as has the Labour party, over the years, in various policy documents. I am therefore pleased that Sir Len is proposing establishing a commission for judicial appointments. However, it is not exactly what I had in mind, and I concur with the Law Society's views on the matter. The commission should have the role of making or recommending appointments to full-time and part-time judicial posts. Commissioners are to be involved in replacing the lay element and in auditing processes. They are also to serve on selection panels, and to be involved in the important function of handling grievances and complaints.

Nevertheless, the fundamental problem with the current system which Sir Len identified remains: the lack of confidence felt by many people in the overall system, notably the consultation system and the judiciary's dominance as consultees.

Sir Len also recommends that the commission should supervise the selection process for silks. It is not quite clear whether the Lord Chancellor will take on board that recommendation, bearing in mind that he has immediately accepted the other recommendation. If selection of silks is to be supervised by the commission, it would be useful to know whether the commissioners will be in place for this year's silk round, to provide that additional safeguard.

I was very pleased to see that Sir Len paid great attention to the need for appraisal and self-appraisal by judges. He said—and I agree:

> "There is general agreement that the transition from barrister or solicitor to judge is one where training and development is necessary".

Sir Len places particular emphasis on development of tutor judges.

Sir Len also praises the experimental scheme on the Wales and Chester circuit. I pay personal tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister, who has taken great interest in promoting that initiative. I shall be very interested to hear whether he will take on board Sir Len's recommendation that there should be a national roll-out of the scheme, and, if so, when he thinks that that might happen. My experience in private practice is that appraisal and self-appraisal—being on both the receiving and dishing-out ends, though that may be putting it too strongly—are a very useful process, both for personal development and for the career development of oneself and one's staff.

We should not confine appraisals to part-time judges and new appointments, but should find a way of extending the process to more of the current full-time judiciary. I realise that there may be constitutional objections to such a proposal, and I am sure that there would be objections to it by individual members of the judiciary who may not have undergone the process when in practice; but we should at least give more consideration to the proposal.

I am concerned about Sir Len's views on equal opportunity, particularly in relation to gender and race. He identifies many of the problems very well, but does not necessarily propose the right solutions. He mentions the excellent work done by the joint working party on equal opportunities in judicial appointments and silk, and it would be very helpful if the Lord Chancellor's Department responded in detail to that body's 42 recommendations, some of which were dealt with by Sir Len.

I think that, initially, we should try to address the issue by extending parts III of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976 to appointments to the judiciary and Queen's Counsel. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said that forthcoming legislation on the public sector will be extended to include indirect discrimination. It would be very worth while if such provision were extended also to those appointments.

I also welcome the commissioning of research by Dr. Kate Malleson into some of the factors that impact on applications from women and ethnic minorities. Perhaps my hon. Friend could give us a progress report on that research and tell us whether it will be made public when it is finished.

We tend to overlook discrimination on disability grounds, but it is taken up by Sir Len. I should have focused on it more in the general contributions that I have made in previous debates. Sir Len recommends that the Department's informal guidelines be made public. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm that he accepts that.

Sir Len also identifies the problems facing practising solicitors applying for judicial appointments, particularly part-time appointments, which are essential to allow the putative judge to get a taste of what is involved and to see whether they are up to the job. Solicitors face various practical hurdles with such part-time appointments, primarily owing to the need to maintain a practice and all the overheads that go with that. One's partners do not always welcome a request to be away for a few days at a time. We need to find ways of overcoming that problem.

I am also concerned about Sir Len's comments about the appointment of Queen's Counsel. My views on the subject are widely known and I do not want to rehearse them in detail. Sir Len repeats a suggestion previously made by others—that silk "could be replaced by professional recognition based on seniority or personal contribution assessed within the representative legal institutions themselves."

That might be a preferable way forward. I am afraid that Sir Len does not tackle the related equal opportunities issues, but we should do so. Some of the recommendations about the judiciary could also apply to the assessment of silks.

I am also concerned about the heavy emphasis on fee earnings, without the balancing factor of pro bono work. Sir Len recommends that a table of fees for successful candidates be published annually. I have achieved that through parliamentary questions over the past couple of years. If the Lord Chancellor's Department does not publish the information in another way, it can expect further parliamentary questions from me.

I welcome Sir Len's report as a contribution to the debate. It is a pity that he was not able to carry out a root and branch investigation into the issue and come up with more fundamental conclusions, but the report is a worthwhile effort to improve the existing system. It may not be an overflowing cornucopia of structural solutions, but the Peach report is at least a modest fruit bowl, with some plum ideas to improve the existing arrangements. It stresses the qualities required of judges and proposes more balance for the consultation arrangements.

Sir Len has come up with some excellent ideas for experimentation to improve the assessment and appraisal system and has strengthened the lay element through the judicial appointments commission—sorry, the Commission for Judicial Appointments. I am not sure why the language has been changed. Perhaps it is to draw a distinction with the wider public debate. He has recognised many of the equal opportunities issues, even if he has not necessarily come up with solutions. The report provides a base that I hope can be used in future to lead to more fundamental root and branch reforms.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. David Lock): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on securing the debate and on all his work over the past few years in bringing this important issue before the public and ensuring that we have a vigorous debate on how our judges are selected and on the merits of the status of Queen's Counsel. He knows that the Government do not entirely agree with his views on the best way of organising those important matters, but we are very grateful for his diligent and assiduous work in ensuring that they remain at the forefront of public debate.

Judges perform a vital role. They are a crucial element in a society that depends on the rule of law. In arbitration, judicial review or damages cases, judges make important decisions that can directly affect the lives of citizens. Therefore, the appointment of judges cannot be left to chance. The judicial appointments process must be capable of identifying the best candidates through fair and open procedures and it must reinforce the principle of judicial independence.

There have been many developments in the judicial and QC appointments processes in recent years, in particular the move to open competitions for most appointments. I know that my hon. Friend and others have strongly welcomed that. The Lord Chancellor is constantly seeking to improve the procedures. In July 1999, he asked Sir Leonard Peach to examine them, to see if any further steps could be taken to improve their openness and accountability. Sir Leonard was given unfettered access to the procedures and to individual records, and he held 40 meetings with groups and individuals to obtain a range of views. He has had a long and distinguished career in personnel at the highest levels and brought his unrivalled experience to bear in his scrutiny of procedures. Until recently, he was Commissioner for Public Appointments. In that role, which was independent of the Government, he monitored, regulated and provided advice on departmental procedures for ministerial appointments to various public bodies. We were confident that he would apply his objectivity and expertise and provide an impartial assessment of the judicial and QC selection procedures.

The Lord Chancellor warmly welcomed Sir Leonard's report when it was published on 3 December 1999 and said that he would act promptly on the central recommendation of appointing a Judicial Appointments Commissioner and would consider Sir Leonard's further recommendations in detail, along with other comments and reactions to his report.

Sir Leonard highlighted the potential confusion between appointment as Queen's Counsel and appointment to the Bench. The Lord Chancellor welcomed Sir Leonard's clear distinction between the criteria for QC and judicial appointments. The rank of QC is awarded to the leading junior advocates of the day, including solicitors. The Lord Chancellor readily acknowledges that the best advocates do not necessarily make the best judges, as my hon. Friend has said. That was made expressly clear in the press notice that accompanied the report.

Today's judges must be able to meet the demands of managing cases and need the personal skills required to run a court, as well as being first-class lawyers. In the past, there may have been too great a tendency to promote the best advocates from the Bar to the Bench, without paying sufficient attention to the possibility of promoting others of equal skill and competence who undertake slightly different functions in the legal system. The skills and experience needed to be a judge can be found in a successful litigation solicitor as well as a leading advocate. That has already been proved by the appointment of solicitors to the Bench. The Lord Chancellor wants to appoint the judges with the best potential, regardless of whether they come from the ranks of barristers or solicitors. I am grateful for the opportunity to make that clear.

My hon. Friend has repeated his concerns about what he calls secret soundings. He suggested that Sir Leonard did not tackle the issue head on. I must respectfully disagree; he looked at it carefully. I do not like the expression "secret soundings". I understand the concerns, but it would be more accurate to talk about confidential assessments of a candidate's suitability. Sir Leonard acknowledged that the consultation process is controversial, but, having looked at it in detail, he said:

"as an experienced selector, my conclusion is that to abandon the consultation process would be a neglect of a valuable input into the assessment."

I stress that it is one part of the assessment and is not conclusive. The system has been approved and enhanced by the report and the Lord Chancellor is committed to retaining that part of the process. He is reassured by Sir Leonard's view.

Assessments are provided in confidence, but that is an inevitable part of any high-level appointments process, whether to the Bench or to other high-level positions. Candidates for the judiciary are told which judges and members of the profession will be consulted and are asked to name others who can assess their suitability. I welcome that development, as does my hon. Friend.

The assessments are provided in writing and are now made against the criteria for appointment. The Lord Chancellor requires consultees to be objective in their assessments and to provide evidence to support them. He disregards any comments that do not appear to be based on that approach and no one person's assessment is or could be decisive. There is nothing to prevent consultees from volunteering information directly to applicants about the assessments they have made of them, but that must be a matter for the consultee alone to decide.

We must accept that in any open competition for judicial posts, more people will be unsuccessful—and therefore to some extent disappointed—than successful. Unsuccessful candidates are able to talk to officials in the Lord Chancellor's Department who will give feedback on the assessments made. The feedback includes, on a non-attributed basis, information about matters contained in the assessments. If the candidate was interviewed, the feedback will also cover how he or she fared in the interview. It is important to note that many candidates take up that offer, and last year about 500 feedback interviews were conducted. Sir Leonard Peach found the feedback system to be "a remarkable feature" and "most impressive". I hope that my hon. Friend—who is also learned—will accept that that is an important part of the confidential assessment process.

Sir Leonard also says that there needs to be confidence in the relevance of the information being provided and that it is based on evidence and not on hearsay. Although that is the aim—and assessments from consultees are already sought on forms which ask for ratings against the criteria and for narrative evidence—Sir Leonard advises on improvements to the system. The Lord Chancellor is happy to take those on board promptly.

My hon. Friend rightly mentioned the additional recommendations for a one-day assessment centre and certain psychometric tests. The recommendations are that we pilot a one-day assessment centre and that psychometric and competence tests be commissioned. The Lord Chancellor intends to take forward those two recommendations together. He appreciates that an assessment centre is to some extent the Rolls-Royce of selection methods and recognises that to set up a one-day pilot assessment centre where psychometric and competence tests will form part of the selection process will be a considerable step forward, entailing considerable effort. None the less, it is important to get it right and we do not envisage being able to take assessment packages off the shelf. Appointing for judicial office is a unique and important function.

The assessment centre, as envisaged by the Lord Chancellor, will have to be tailor made for judicial appointments, so there will have to be a considerable amount of work over the next one to two years to set up the pilot. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that the matter is being taken forward.

The Lord Chancellor has accepted in principle Sir Leonard's proposal that there should be a Commission for Judicial Appointments. He envisages appointing this year a first commissioner, who will be supported in due course by a team of deputy commissioners. The commissioners will be drawn from a range of backgrounds and the commission will undertake the tasks outlined by Sir Leonard.

I can tell my hon. Friend, as he raised the matter specifically, that this year's silk round—that is, those who are to be notified at Easter this year—will not have the benefit of the Commission for Judicial Appointments, but we hope that all open competitions for the judiciary later in the year and next year's silk round will have the benefit of the commission.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I thank the Minister for giving way. Will he confirm that the terms of reference of the judicial appointments commissioners will be published and that it is his and the Lord Chancellor's wish that there will be no element of political correctness or any artificial concept of gender and ethnic balance? We want the very best people for all these appointments. Will that be clearly set out in the judicial appointments commissioners' terms of reference?

Mr. Lock: I can certainly assure the hon. Gentleman that the terms of reference for the Commission for Judicial Appointments will be published. As for political correctness, I assure him that we are looking for the best candidates for the judiciary and those candidates will be drawn from those who apply.

I accept that we have only 10 women on the High Court Bench. To some extent, that is a reflection of entry into the legal profession some 20 to 25 years ago, retention within the legal profession, and the processes of advancement within the private legal professions that have brought about the circumstances where those who apply with suitable experience and eminence come from a relatively limited pool. However, as I said earlier, the Lord Chancellor remains concerned that that group should be identified according to their true characteristics and experience of judicial office, which is much wider than just the best advocates appearing on the front row in the courts today. I hope that that will expand the pool and result in more people applying.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lock: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Although the Minister can indeed give way, in such a debate as this he is under no pressure or obligation to do so as it is a debate between one hon. Member and the Minister. However, as the Minister has given way, I hope that the intervention will be brief.

Mr. Grieve: I shall indeed be brief. Will the Minister confirm that the statistics available would suggest that the pool is expanding and that, for instance, the number of women who are likely to be eligible to apply for the judiciary will be much larger than it was 25 years ago and is increasing?

Mr. Lock: I can certainly confirm that the pool is expanding. Hon. Members may be interested to know that there are now one solicitor, 10 women, but unfortunately no High Court judges of ethnic origin. At the lower levels, the figures are more encouraging. Of 634 appointments filled by means of open competition in 1998-99, 23.5 per cent., or just under a quarter, were women; 5.4 per cent. were of ethnic minority origin; 46.4 per cent. were solicitors; 37.1 per cent. were junior barristers; 5.7 per cent. were Queen's Counsel and 10.9 per cent. were non-practising lawyers. Although there is a good spread across judicial appointments generally, I accept that we still have work to do at senior levels.

My hon. Friend has raised a large number of issues and I anticipate having to write to him on those that I do not have time to cover. I am happy to confirm that the Kate Malleson research into race and sex discrimination, which covers an important matter, is due to be published this month and of course will be made public.

My hon. Friend also referred to appraisal—an important but delicate issue. The pilot in north Wales involving deputy district judges is impressive and appears to be going well, but it would not be appropriate to roll out any pilot until we were confident that we had managed to assess its full impact and learned lessons from it—otherwise it would not be a pilot.

I can assure my hon. Friend that we approach appraisal very much for the benefit of the people being appraised and not as a quasi-disciplinary stick to be held over part-time judges as a reason for not appointing them. It is all part of the process of ensuring that we get the best judges available for our courts. Appraisal issues in respect of the full-time judiciary are very much more delicate and must, in essence, be a matter for the judges themselves, without straying into their judicial independence. As my hon. Friend realises, I am sure that there are delicate issues of constitutional propriety involved.

In essence, Sir Leonard's report gave the team in the Lord Chancellor's Department very good marks for their work. He said that the overall impression of the Department's work was one of thoroughness, competence and professionalism. However, there are clearly areas where we can improve and we are grateful to Sir Len for highlighting them. The work will be carried through quickly and thoroughly. It is a very important area and we must make sure that we get it right. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon for introducing the debate and I hope that I have answered many of the points that he has raised.

Energy for Democracy (Serbia)

1 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I quote from a fax sent by Ms Emilja Kiel to the UK Committee for Peace in the Balkans, made available to me by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon). The fax states:

"Yesterday in Belgrade a baby girl of six months died of cold. She was a Serbian Kosovo refugee whose parents along with a group of other Serbs from Kosovo found shelter in the ruins of a (NATO bombed) concrete factory."

The family of the little girl had been ethnically cleansed from Kosovo and left unprotected by NATO and the United Nations. At present, Serbia and Kosovo are covered in snow, with temperatures down to minus 20 deg centigrade; that is to be expected each year in that part of Europe and is thus predictable. Indeed, it was predicted by the Select Committee on International Development in our report on Kosovo. The situation was not unforeseen.

The European Union imposed sanctions against Serbia during the bombing, including a ban on oil exports that it has steadfastly refused to lift since the bombing ceased. Council regulation No. 2111/1999 of 4 October confirmed the prohibition of the sale and supply of petroleum products.

The EU has knowingly deprived Serbia of the capacity to keep its people warm. It has thus endangered the lives of young children and the elderly by exposing them to hypothermia. That was a deliberate EU policy, supported by the UK Government. We have bombed Serbian power stations and oil refineries. By bombing the bridges, we have blocked the main supply line—the Danube.

The objective—although it was steadfastly denied—was to depose President Milosevic and his party from office in the former Republic of Yugoslavia. However, the EU action has had the opposite effect. NATO and the EU are blamed for the suffering of all the people of Serbia and the estimated 900,000 refugees in Serbia—100,000 of whom have been ethnically cleansed from Kosovo.

Cynically—or perhaps from feelings of guilt—the EU decided to launch a programme entitled Energy for Democracy, supported by the UK. The programme is described as humanitarian and is thereby exempt from the EU's own sanctions.

I remind hon. Members that humanitarian aid must have two characteristics. The first is that it must be administered impartially to all people in need regardless of whom they support. Secondly, those who administer humanitarian aid must do so with the consent of all authorities on all sides of a dispute. The obvious example is the work of the International Committee of the Red Cross which, without such an agreement, would be unable to operate on both sides in a conflict or dispute.

One definition of the objective of humanitarian assistance states that it should be

"to prevent and alleviate human suffering, to protect life and health and ensure respect for the human being. This definition provides for protecting and re-establishing livelihoods, not just saving life . . . From this follows the principle of impartiality: humanitarian actors should not discriminate as to nationality, race, religious beliefs, class or political opinions; resource allocation being guided solely on the basis of needs of individuals, prioritising the most urgent cases of distress."

The principle of independence follows from that:

"The ability of humanitarian organisations to operate legally and safely in a conflict situation is determined by their ability to demonstrate their independent character. Actual and perceived involvement of a donor government in the workings of international humanitarian organisations potentially compromises this independence."

We offend against those principles of humanitarian aid. In particular, the Energy for Democracy programme offends against them on almost every count. It aims to supply 350 tonnes of heating oil to two Serbian towns—Nis and Pirot. That was the first part of a 4.4 million euro project to supply the cities until April this year. The reason that those two cities were targeted was that their mayors did not support the Milosevic Government. NATO and the EU wanted to demonstrate to the people of those cities that NATO cared for them and that the alliance's quarrel was only with the Milosevic Government.

I might have some enthusiasm for the objective of subverting Milosevic, but that NATO action cannot be called humanitarian. It is partial and it is not administered with the agreement of the authorities in Serbia. It is certainly not impartial; nor is it independent.

Where does the money come from? After much research, I found that it was provided from the European development budget, to which the UK Government make a significant contribution—as the Chamber has already discussed this morning. The appropriation comes from a budget designed for the reconstruction of parts of former Yugoslavia—later Kosovo.

The appropriation of such money for bluntly and blatantly political purposes is almost certainly illegal. It will have to be referred to the Court of Auditors, which has, sadly, become accustomed to the gay abandon with which the European Commission spends our money on projects that are unauthorised by this Parliament or by the European Parliament.

If we are sincere about trying to help Yugoslavia in its reconstruction, we should ensure that all those who have suffered from the Milosevic regime and the NATO bombing have sufficient heating oil to keep them warm this winter. That would be a truly humanitarian and magnanimous gesture to the people of Serbia. It might begin to heal some of the wounds and begin the reconciliation and reconstruction necessary for the achievement of the just Balkan settlement for which our Prime Minister agreed to bomb Serbia—one of his major aims in the war against Serbia. However, this partial, illegal and cynical gesture of the Energy for Democracy programme is more likely to exacerbate the hatreds and jealousies within Serbia and against the EU and NATO.

I ask the Minister of State to answer the following questions. First, why have the Government not tried to lift the EU sanctions on heating oil supplies to Serbia? Is it because we are acting as the poodle of the United States in those matters?

Secondly, why have the Government agreed to break their own sanctions by supplying heating oil to Nis and Pirot? Thirdly, how can supplies of heating oil to those cities be justified as humanitarian aid when no such supplies are provided to the rest of the Serb population and when they do not have the approval and agreement of the Serbian Government?

Fourthly, what assessment was made of the likely reaction of the Serbian Government of President Milosevic to the initiative? Fifthly, why did the United States refuse to support the Energy for Democracy scheme? Sixthly, how do the Government justify the use of aid money, voted for the reconstruction of the former Republic of Yugoslavia, for blatant, cynical, political blackmail?

The Government claim to have won the war against Serbia by bombing that country. They are certainly losing the peace by such ill-considered, blatantly political, possibly illegal schemes as the Energy for Democracy programme. A Government who were truly pursuing a humanitarian aim would support France, Greece, Italy and other EU nations in lifting EU sanctions for the whole of Serbia, and in permitting the supply of heating oil throughout Serbia on humanitarian grounds during the extreme weather conditions that are always experienced in the region at this time of year. That would prevent the black market and the entry to Serbia of Russian-supported oil supplies via Hungary and Romania. The distribution of those supplies is of course controlled by President Milosevic—thus increasing his grip on power and his ill-gotten wealth.

1.9 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. John Battle): We thank the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for initiating the debate. I was tempted to say "again", because we discussed the matter during the debate on Kosovo in which our colleague my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) also took part.

The hon. Gentleman is the most appropriate Member to raise matters of humanitarian aid and assistance and to remind us of what the term may mean in practice. He has a long and honourable record on, and experience in, overseas aid and development matters. He speaks on them with a disinterest and seriousness that sets an example so I take seriously his contribution to our deliberations on the topic. I shall do my best to reply to the 10 or more questions that he asked.

In this short debate, we do not need to go over the cause of the traumas in the Balkans or the role in Serbian history of Slobodan Milosevic. I want to approach the subject from another angle and to point out that, on the figures for gross domestic product, Serbia is the poorest country in the whole of Europe—it is now poorer than Albania. Given that Yugoslavia was one of the wealthiest countries in the socialist bloc in the 1980s, we must focus on what has happened, why it has happened and on the future and rebuilding. In that spirit, I shall try to address the issue of how people keep warm in winter and the relationship between fuel supplies and sanctions.

I want to say something elementary about the difference between the central and eastern European countries that emerged from the Soviet bloc in the first half of the 1990s and Serbia under the direction of Milosevic. In a sense, the essential services, commodities and state monopolies were used to secure the loyalty of his key supporters in the Socialist party of Serbia, the SPS.

Let me provide a practical example. The present boss of Jugopetrol, which controls the import and distribution of oil and oil derivatives on a national basis is a man called Dragan Tomic. He is also the Speaker of the Serb Parliament and, of course, a key figure in the SPS. Basically, he has been put in charge of the oil industry as a reward for loyal service to Milosevic and he is now making—I dare suggest—massive profits from the sale of imported oil and petrol. He does not use the prescribed channels and state petrol stations, in which the price is set by the Government, but uses the black market to provide him with his profits. That is a key fact. The problems of the Serbian economy relate not just to analyses of economic mishandling, but to such direct manipulative interests.

In the short time that I have left, I shall discuss the Energy for Democracy programme. That European Union programme was first proposed by an independent group of Serb economists, the G-17 group, in the summer of 1999 in the aftermath of the Kosovo conflict. Its idea was for the EU to show its solidarity with the people of Serbia—as opposed to the regime—by donating mostly heating oil to Serbian towns, which were expected to struggle to provide sufficient heating for their citizens through the current winter. The idea was taken up by the member states of the EU and turned into an official EU programme in the autumn of 1999. The United Kingdom played a supportive role and it helped the G-17 group to visit several European capitals, including London, to explain and spell out its ideas. We have since supported that programme.

The programme began in November 1999 with the pilot project towns of Nis and Pirot, and I emphasise that it was a pilot. The towns have received regular tankers of heating oil since December and the EU is now switching to rail transport to improve the speed and reliability of the deliveries. Supply has been running behind schedule because of administrative difficulties, but, by the end of January, those towns had received more than 2,000 tonnes of heating oil.

One misunderstanding about the Energy for Democracy programme needs to be cleared up. It is not designed to compensate for a shortage of oil in Serbia; it is designed to compensate for a shortage of money to buy that oil. That difference is crucial. In other words, the municipal authorities that have been the beneficiaries of the Energy for Democracy programme have always been free to import oil and oil products from certain neighbouring countries or from further afield, but they have not had the money to do so. The programme involves the donation of heating oil.

Mr. Wells: The Minister referred to the towns' capacity to buy oil, but would they not have to buy it outside the European Union, because the EU has imposed sanctions against the supply of oil to Serbia? Is that not right?

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on the precise point, so I shall try to spell out where supplies come from and where the EU anticipates that they will come from. I hope that that will become clear. However, if the hon. Gentleman wants to press me on the matter, I shall be more than happy for him to intervene again.

The EU oil embargo on Serbia has been changed specifically to allow the sourcing of oil from EU countries for the Energy for Democracy programme. In practice, however, imports have all come from refineries in Macedonia. Had the municipal authorities been given adequate funding by central Government, they could simply have bought oil supplies from domestic suppliers or imported what they required for their needs from Macedonia or perhaps Bulgaria.

The hon. Gentleman asked on whose authority the EU introduced sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1998. It did so on its own authority using the established procedures of the EU common foreign and security policy and the competences vested in the EU by the treaty of Rome and subsequent treaties. The sanctions included the specific oil embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In September 1999, the oil embargo was lifted in respect of Montenegro and Kosovo.

From the very outset, a humanitarian exemption was written into the EU oil embargo. That still applies. In other words, any organisation that wants to import oil or oil products into Serbia from a member state of the EU may do so, having submitted an application to the European Commission explaining that the oil is for humanitarian purposes. I hope that that goes some way to answering the hon. Gentleman's question. Such imports have taken place in at least one case.

The Belgrade office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees applied to import 40,000 tonnes of heating oil from Germany, and this application was approved on humanitarian grounds. It is possible for oil to be bought from European countries, and approval is a relatively simple process. Any international humanitarian organisation operating in Serbia is free to follow that route. I hope that my answer goes some way to allaying the hon. Gentleman's worst fears. It can happen, it does happen and it can continue to happen.

I stress that the EU has not broken its own sanctions, as the hon. Gentleman put it. Apart from the humanitarian exemption that is written into the embargo, the EU has also changed the text of the oil embargo regulation to allow EU companies to supply oil under the Energy for Democracy programme. In practice, however, the heating oil supplied by the EU has been purchased from Macedonia for reasons of efficiency. Macedonia and other neighbouring countries, such as Bulgaria, do not have national restrictions on selling oil to Serbia. The EU oil embargo applies only to EU member states, and to those associate member states that choose to affiliate themselves to it.

The EU anticipated that the Energy for Democracy programme would be vulnerable to administrative obstruction by the Serbian authorities. That was the primary reason for beginning the programme with a pilot project of just two towns. As we suspected, the Serbian authorities made life as difficult as practically possible on the border, and we discussed that here in our previous debate on the subject. There were blockages, but they did not persist, not least because of local popular pressure. The delay of more than two weeks that the first consignment suffered has not been repeated. The first trucks were greeted with cheering in Nis and Pirot, and Milosevic has not dared to make himself even more unpopular by restricting or blocking the import of heating oil—it is getting through.

I am glad to say that, contrary to some reports, the United States has offered political support for Energy for Democracy. Indeed, in the autumn Mrs. Albright mentioned in public that she hoped that the programme could be extended to the town of Cacak. The US has been supportive of the programme during the EU's discussions with the US and Yugoslav opposition in the so-called trilateral process. Cacak became the third town to benefit from the programme when Norway decided to support Energy for Democracy with a programme of deliveries of heating oil.

Apart from the Norwegian bilateral contribution, Energy for Democracy has been funded by the European Commission from the Obnova regulation budget, which exists to fund projects in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Obnova is not a budget for classic humanitarian aid, as it has been defined by the hon. Gentleman. The EU's aid programme in Serbia is run through the European Community humanitarian office in Belgrade, which has not been involved in Energy for Democracy. The humanitarian office is responsible for Serbia's and Montenegro's share of the total regional allocation for south-east Europe in 1999 of 378 million euros.

Energy for Democracy is humanitarian in motivation, but it is not classified as strict humanitarian aid, as the hon. Gentleman spelled out. Imports of heating oil by the municipalities in question are treated as straight commercial transactions. The municipalities pay the customs duties, and the external suppliers invoice the European Union direct. I am glad to say that the UK's Crown Agents have been involved in the logistics of operating Energy for Democracy.

The humanitarian dimension of the programme is obvious: the imports of heating oil have been used to keep residential accommodation, schools, hospitals and municipal facilities warm through the depths of the winter in Nis and Pirot. Not all dwellings in those towns are connected to the municipal heating system, but most citizens will still have benefited. I understand that the Norwegian programme in Cacak and the prospective EU programme in Kragujevac will concentrate on schools, hospitals and similar institutions. In an ideal world, we would be supplying fuel for warmth to the entire population of Serbia, but clearly we have to prioritise.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): How does one prioritise when a child is dying in a bombed-out concrete factory? How does one say that one town cannot have oil while another town can? That is not humanitarian, and I am shocked that my Government are going along with something as obscene as deciding who lives and who dies in Serbia.

Mr. Battle: I defer to my hon. Friend's insistence that we keep people's names and faces in front of us so that we do not make judgments that put people's lives on the line. However, there are practical problems.

[Mr. Battle]

Not all dwellings in my hon. Friend's town of Halifax have heating connected to a central system. That technical difference is important because we have chosen towns where an oil-fired municipal heating plant is the key source of heating. Unlike Britain, the former Soviet Union has combined heat and power systems that work. That means that if we put oil in the central boiler, all flats are heated. That is not the system in Britain, where we would have to heat houses and flats on an individual basis with a separate fire. Not every house has a chimney, so we could not supply coal to every house to keep it warm.

Technical challenges are posed by the heating systems, so there is not a deliberate decision about who lives and who dies. We have chosen towns where a working oil-fired municipal heating plant is the key source of heating or where other facilities need oil for generators. Provision is linked to the location of the generators; it is not done house by house.

There are three reasons why we have so far limited the programme also to municipalities run by the parties of the democratic opposition. First, they are much less likely to be corrupt than municipalities run by the SPS and its allies. Secondly, opposition-run municipalities have been the subject of systematic discrimination by the central Serbian authorities, which have limited their funds and done everything possible to damage their standing in the eyes of the electorate. Those towns are usually last on the list for the distribution of Serbian state oil supplies.

Thirdly, the regime-linked municipalities have largely refused to co-operate with Energy for Democracy. A questionnaire sent out by the Association of Free Towns and Municipalities asking for technical details of their heating systems for the Energy for Democracy programme was ignored by every SPS and allied town.

On the general international humanitarian effort in Serbia, I can confirm that the International Committee of the Red Cross and Red Crescent, the UNHCR, UNICEF and others are active in Serbia, with our support, along with numerous other charities and non-governmental organisations. The Department for International Development works alongside and maintains close links with the UN agencies and other bodies. The UNHCR has supplied some 40,000 tonnes of oil to Belgrade and the whole of Serbia, while Energy for Democracy has supplied 2,000 tonnes. The UNHCR has therefore been providing the bulk of the supplies. We have supported those programmes.

Mr. Wells: Why, then, do not our Government support the lifting of sanctions, at least on oil for heating, throughout Serbia?

Mr. Battle: The block sanctions remain for the whole of Serbia. This is an exception which means that we can get energy through, but we have to choose where it goes. I set out the three reasons why it is not apposite to send oil everywhere—it would be lost in the corrupt system and would not reach the people who need it, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax referred. That is why we focus supplies on two particular towns.

The EU General Affairs Council, which met on 24 January, concluded:

> "In the light of the latest positive developments and of the outcome of the pilot project in Nis and Pirot, the Council invited the Commission to prepare the extension of the Energy for Democracy initiative, as suggested by Serbian opposition forces after the Berlin trilateral meeting of 17 December 1999."

As I said, the Commission plans to start with the town of Kragujevac. The other towns identified as immediate priorities are Novi Sad, Sombor, Subotica and Kraljevo.

The humanitarian exemptions written into the EU sanctions regime on Serbia and the EU's commitment to the Energy for Democracy programme have shown that we care about the fate of the ordinary people of Serbia and are not indifferent to their plight. Thankfully, the threatened humanitarian disaster did not transpire this winter—action was taken to pre-empt it—but we have no illusion about the economy of Serbia, which is in a bad state.

As I said at the outset, Serbia is now the poorest country in Europe. Living standards have plummeted. All that can start Serbia back on the path of economic recovery is a change in the regime and a strategy for the nation's well-being. There is not much evidence of that. Those factors were the source of the conflict in the first place. The Energy for Democracy programme is a small but serious effort to ensure that the poorest and hardest hit do not always pay the highest price.

Taiwan

1.30 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): At the outset I declare an interest as the co-chairman, along with the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), of the all-party British-Taiwanese group. We are an active group. We have an excellent relationship with His Excellency the Taiwanese representative to the United Kingdom, Mr. Loui Tzen, and his colleagues in London.

Taiwan and the UK enjoy an excellent relationship. Taiwan has been and is a major investor in this country, locating some of the most modern industrial enterprises here. With such investment have come some of the most advanced technological developments and many jobs throughout the country. One has only to speak to hon. Members to hear of the respect in which those companies are held by their work forces and local communities.

There are excellent commercial and financial arrangements between our two countries: 80 per cent. of Taiwan's European investment is in the UK. The British-Taiwanese business council is a very active organisation which discusses trade between our two countries. It held a major conference in London in January. More than 70 constituencies contain a company or companies of Taiwanese origin. That shows Taiwan's involvement in this country.

Yesterday, I showed around the House a group of young Taiwanese diplomats who are on a year's study at Oxford. Given that there were no financial restrictions on their studies, they could have chosen to go to any country. Each year, a further 13,000 Taiwanese students study here.

Taiwan has a population of 21 million and one of the strongest economies in the world—at present, ranking 15th strongest. Against that background, it is appropriate to highlight the call on the British Government and their people to support Taiwan's application for observer status in the World Health Organisation.

As a major world economic power, Taiwan has an excellent health service. Its doctors and nurses have trained or studied in some of the world's major medical schools. One of the most modern hospitals in this country, St. George's, Tooting, in my constituency, was recently visited by the Taiwan Health Minister, himself a doctor. It soon became clear in discussions during that visit that Taiwan's wide range of medical and health services are equal to anything in the United Kingdom. Despite such quality, it is not a member of the World Health Organisation. Let us be frank, that is not because of its medical standards, but because of political attitudes. In my view and that of many others, that is totally unacceptable.

I chair the Social, Health and Family Affairs Committee of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. In Strasbourg last week, we discussed a report on European health policy, which I have with me today. The debate highlighted how much the Council of Europe's 41 member states appreciate the opportunity to meet and discuss relevant health issues and progress in treatment and research. Taiwan seeks such involvement in WHO, which would enable its medical professionals to share their knowledge and skill with their international colleagues.

As Taiwan does not have WHO observer status, it cannot discuss wide-ranging and often complex technological developments or disease control with WHO members. It can neither obtain information on new health care and policies by working directly with WHO and its members nor take part in seminars or training programmes that are organised by WHO. How can that be realistic or fair?

Governments are not always those with skills for or the sole agents of world health developments. The medical profession uses its skills to build health policies, sustain health activity and broaden health strategies, which we all know are wide ranging and affected by economic and social behaviour and scientific and technological development. Countries such as Taiwan want to exchange skills and to learn about other countries' medical developments. Such exchange, above all else, is the role of the World Health Organisation—and why Taiwan seeks observer status in it.

This country enjoys excellent medical services, but we share our skills, learn from other countries and are actively involved in WHO. So many of the developments that we talk about have been made as a result of international co-operation. We have been able to progress our skills in the fields of primary health care, vaccines, AIDS and HIV, family planning, health insurance policy, health information and expenditure and immunisation through co-operation with other countries. We have been able to work together to promote health and the welfare of people not only in this country but world wide. That is what Taiwan seeks in observer status.

In recent years, Taiwan has sent more than 400 medical personnel, who work in different areas of health care, to countries such as the United States of America, the UK, Japan, Australia and New Zealand for advanced health and medical training. On that ground, Taiwan is more than worthy of WHO observer status.

The case that I have presented is very strong, but support for Taiwan's application can be found in organisations that are far more influential. A letter dated 12 January from Professor Vivienne Nathanson, head of the professional resources and research group of the British Medical Association, states:

"It would certainly be desirable for the medical profession in Taiwan to enjoy the advantages offered by links with the WHO, and we should therefore certainly support its application for observer status."

That is a very powerful endorsement which cannot easily be ignored.

The other comment I wish to quote is drawn from a document of the 106th Congress of the United States of America, dated 6 January 1999 and headed "Concerning the participation of Taiwan in the World Health Organization". It states:

"The World Health Organization . . . set forth in the first chapter of its charter the objective of attaining the highest possible level of health for all people . . . Taiwan's population of 21,000,000 people is larger than that of three-fourths of the member states already in the World Health Organization . . . Taiwan's achievements in the field of health are substantial, including one of the highest life expectancy levels in Asia, maternal and infant mortality rates comparable to those of western countries, the eradication of such infectious diseases as cholera, smallpox, and the plague, and the first to be rid of polio and provide children with free hepatitis B vaccinations . . . The World Health Organization allows observers to participate in the activities of the organization . . . In light of all the benefits that Taiwan's participation in the World Health Organization could bring to the state of health not only in Taiwan, but also regionally and globally, Taiwan and its 21,000,000 people should have appropriate and meaningful participation in the World Health Organization."

That is a powerful recommendation and expression of support for Taiwan.

What is the view of the British Government? We have a good relationship with Taiwan, whose people have brought great benefit to the United Kingdom. I have quoted correspondence that clearly supports Taiwan's request for observer status within WHO. Does the UK support that request? If we do, what shall we do to support Taiwan in the coming months before the next WHO meeting in the Geneva? If we do not, will my hon. Friend the Minister clearly state the reasons in his reply? In my view and that of many others, Taiwan should be supported in its request. Taiwan and its many friends here in the UK Parliament, in business and in the financial community in this country, will be greatly interested to learn of the views of the British Government and their attitude to Taiwan's request for observer status within WHO.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. John Battle): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) for having raised the subject of Taiwan and its relationship with the World Health Organisation. He is well known and rightly respected for the disinterested fashion in which he draws attention to Taiwan and ensures that it is not forgotten by the House of Commons. His efforts and his serious interest in Taiwan are appreciated.

Although there are obvious political constraints on our relationship with Taiwan, I fully agree with my hon. Friend that we need to take Taiwan seriously. I assure the House that the Government do so and that we are looking for ways to strengthen and develop that relationship. I welcome and fully concur with my hon. Friend's remarks on the excellent state of relations between Taiwan and Britain. I hope that we can continue to build on that.

It is fair to say that the question of Taiwan's relationship with WHO, or with any other international organisation or element in the international community, cannot be considered without taking into account the complex issue of Taiwan's international status and the effect that that has on Taiwan's ability to play a fully recognised international role. The whole international community, not only the UK, are involved in that issue.

The House will be aware of the UK Government's formal policy on the status of Taiwan, which was laid down in 1972 when the UK upgraded relations with the People's Republic of China to ambassadorial level. In a joint communique agreed with the Chinese Government and announced on 13 March 1972, the UK Government of the day stated that the UK recognised the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal Government of China, and acknowledged the position of the People's Republic of China that Taiwan is a province of China. That remains our policy and forms the foundation of our dealings with Taiwan.

It follows that the UK has no formal political or diplomatic relations with Taiwan. That is not an unusual or unique position; it is shared by most other countries in the world, including our European partners and other close partners such as the United States. Although the precise formulation may differ slightly from one country to another, all have adopted a similar view and operate under similar constraints in their political dealings with Taiwan and its authorities. Only a handful of countries currently afford full diplomatic recognition to Taiwan as the "Republic of China". That position is unlikely to change significantly in the near future.

Taiwan's lack of widespread international recognition has obvious consequences for Taiwan's aspirations to membership of international organisations, especially those, such as WHO, whose membership is limited to states. As neither the UK nor the United Nations, where the People's Republic of China has had a seat since 1971, recognises Taiwan as a state, it follows that we cannot support Taiwan's membership of international organisations that only states may join.

However, we are keen to find creative ways in which Taiwan can play a role in the international community, consistent with our policy on recognition while allowing Taiwan's commercial and economic significance and its medical expertise to be properly reflected and embraced by the international community. For example, we look forward to Taiwan joining the World Trade Organisation, under the right terms, in its capacity as the customs territory of Taiwan, Kinmen, Matsu and Penghu.

Although there are constraints on the extent to which we can develop a political relationship with Taiwan, in many other respects—including, but not solely, trade and commerce—we are trying to build a strong and fruitful relationship with Taiwan and its people. As my hon. Friend said, Taiwan has a vibrant, powerful economy: it is the world's 14th largest trading entity and its transformation from an almost entirely agrarian economy to a leading industrial economy is phenomenal—one of the economic miracles of Asia. Its economy is shifting to new technologies to become a high-tech knowledge-driven economy of the future. Taiwan is at the leading edge.

We have a long history of trade and economic relations—and personal relations—with Taiwan. I am grateful that my hon. Friend has shown people around the House to make sure that those personal relationships deepen. That and his showing a representative of Taiwan around a hospital in his constituency are much appreciated. In the past decade, with one or two blips such as in 1998, during the Asian financial crisis, our exports to Taiwan have shown a steady upward trend. The 1999 figures will show a slight recovery: although they will not achieve the £1 billion of exports that we achieved in 1997, there may be a marginal increase on 1998 levels, which shows that the tide is turning.

Imports from Taiwan are now well over twice the level of exports and are rising steadily. As my hon. Friend spelt out, Taiwan is an important investor in the United Kingdom. We are pleased that Taiwan sees Britain as a gateway to Europe. We have attracted almost 85 per cent. of Taiwan's total investment in the European Union. Major developments include the Chung-hwa picture tubes factory in Scotland, which was opened by Her Majesty the Queen in October 1997. That brought 3,000 new jobs to Scotland and is the largest single Taiwanese investment in Europe. We want more investment from Taiwan. At the same time, we are substantial investors in Taiwan and we are working to support British investors there. The Government are keen to promote those activities. The British trade and cultural office in Taipei, our unofficial representation there, is specifically tasked to support British trading and business interests.

We encourage private ministerial visits to Taiwan by Ministers whose responsibilities lie in areas in which our links with Taiwan are strong. The Minister of State, Scotland Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who was the Minister for Trade at the time, visited Taiwan last year. The present Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), will visit Taiwan in two weeks. We want to keep ministerial visits, although they are private, as continuous, close, personal links with Taiwan, and we hope that there will be many more such visits in both directions in the future.

The relationship is far more than simply commercial. It is not based solely on trade and commerce. My hon. Friend spoke eloquently about medical exchanges and the development of Taiwan's medical contribution internationally. I welcome his words and look forward, as he does, to deepening those highly professional exchanges. I welcome the fact that the Taiwanese Minister for Health was one of the first senior Taiwanese visitors to this country since our Government took office.

Britain and Taiwan have much to learn from each other in medical practice and training, and that is precisely the sort of exchange that we should develop, so that we can learn from each other, to mutual benefit and the benefit of our planet. We are eager to promote people-to-people exchanges in education, culture, science and medicine.

As my hon. Friend said, Taiwan is a highly educated society which places a high value on education at all levels. We are pleased that the UK has been an important destination for Taiwanese people who want to study abroad. There are 15,000 Taiwanese studying at British universities and other institutes of further education in Britain. They are most welcome. They bring new perspectives to our institutions. They make a contribution; they do not just study, collect information and go away again. They help to transform the environment in which they are studying. According to the latest figures, more than 50,000 Taiwanese tourists came to Britain in 1997. Such exchanges are important and help to bind us together.

The key question posed by my hon. Friend was Taiwan's relationship with the World Health Organisation. He made an eloquent case expressing the desire of the Taiwanese authorities to gain observer status at WHO. It is no part of my purpose to deny the strength of those feelings or to question them. We believe that, wherever possible and appropriate, Taiwan's aspirations should be considered sympathetically.

However, the political realities and China's likely objections cannot be ignored and wished away. Taiwan's health care is undoubtedly of a high calibre, as befits a highly developed economy such as that of Taiwan. It is therefore no surprise that the medical profession in Taiwan should seek to be associated with the World Health Organisation, one of the world's principal medical forums, and that there should be strong backing in parts of the international medical community for contacts with Taiwan. The House and my hon. Friend are aware of the practical problems.

I have outlined the problem of Taiwan's membership of international bodies whose membership is limited to states. One possible way forward that has been canvassed is for Taiwan to seek observer status. Some organisations, including some non-governmental organisations, are already observers. There is no formal mechanism whereby entities that aspire to such status may apply to become observers. I believe that I am correctly informed that Taiwan has not applied for such status.

I understand that the director general of WHO has discretion to confer observer status on a non-state entity where its participation would be non-controversial. She has not done so to date, but there is no harm in considering that as a possible way forward.

The only route to the attainment of observer status is for a proposal to be made in favour of the aspirant by a full member of the World Health Organisation at the annual meeting of the World Health Assembly. It is open to the Taiwanese authorities to pursue that route, as they have done for a number of years. Any application put before the assembly's general committee stands to undergo rigorous examination by all member Governments, including the Chinese. If Taiwan and China could agree between themselves on suitable conditions for Taiwan's entry, that would ease the process considerably.

I hope that I have made it clear in response to my hon. Friend's passionate and well-reasoned case that our Government are fully aware of the medical work undertaken in Taiwan, and of the importance that Taiwanese authorities attach to the possibility of Taiwan's playing an international role within WHO. We hope that a satisfactory solution can be found.

We cannot be starry-eyed and simply wish our way into the future. There are practical and political obstacles on the way, but we should do our best to set out the case and to enable negotiations to take place, so that the medical expertise that exists in Taiwan can be afforded its true status and recognised internationally, and so that Taiwan can make an international contribution, which could be to the benefit of the whole of humanity.

Question put and agreed to.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Children's Social Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dowd.]

2.30 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his Budget statement in March he said that children form 20 per cent. of the country's population but represent 100 per cent. of its future. I think there is common agreement that tomorrow's prosperity will be built on the success and skills of today's children. That is why the Government are committed to ending child poverty within 20 years, and are modernising services for children and their families at every stage of their lives. All children should be able to develop confidence and a sense of responsibility for themselves and for others. The most vulnerable children need protection, care and the best possible chance of success throughout life. Every child deserves the opportunity to live in a stable and safe environment, to enjoy the best physical and mental health possible, to thrive at school and to make a successful transition to adulthood.

The Government have a strong belief that the children of today will shape tomorrow's society. That means that every single one of us has an interest in making sure that children thrive, and are helped to grow up into healthy and socially responsible adults. Children thrive best in a stable family environment. Families are, therefore, the core of our society. In recognition of that, we gave a commitment in our manifesto that we would uphold family life as the most secure means of bringing up children. In doing so, we have focused on five key areas.

First, we are improving family prosperity, through the tax and benefit systems such as, for example, in-work benefits. Secondly, we are making it easier for families to balance work and home—through the development of family-friendly employment policies, and a national child care strategy to expand the provision of early years care and education. Thirdly, we are reducing the risks of family breakdown. Fourthly, we are ensuring that all parents have access to the advice and support that they need to raise their children successfully through our sure start programme, and other initiatives. Finally, we are tackling the more serious problems of family life, such as domestic violence, juvenile offending and teenage pregnancy. Action is under way to tackle each of those issues.

Tackling child poverty is also a priority for the Government. Poverty is complex. Of course family income and prosperity are crucial, but it is also about poor housing, poor health and poor education. It is also about a lack of opportunity as a child and the lack of a job as a parent. There is a poverty of expectation that leaves many jobless parents expecting no better for their children than they have experienced themselves. Desperate situations can often lead to desperate measures: alcohol, drugs, domestic violence and crime. Many of those factors are closely interlinked. Together, they create a crushing spiral of disadvantage—one that all too often persists throughout people's lives.

Many of these children and families will need the specialist care and involvement of professional social services. Some children need to be protected by social services. Some need the local authority to take on a parental role for them. Whatever their difficult and traumatic experiences before being taken into care, children who are looked after by local authorities are entitled to the same opportunities as all children. They are entitled to a good education, to the health care and other specialist help they need and to consistent support, advice and practical help to guide them into adult life. The majority are in care not because of what they have done, but because of family breakdown. These are children with real potential and talent, and it is our responsibility to ensure that those talents are allowed to develop and grow.

Improving children's social services is therefore part of the Government's wider strategy to tackle the problems of social exclusion and provide better support to children and their families. The social services' contribution to that work is crucial. Social services are closely involved with the sure start programme to help pre-school children, which is worth £450 million in England; with the new youth support service ConneXions, which is being announced today; and with the youth offending teams designed to cut youth crime.

However, the evidence is that too many children were failed by the services that should have been helping them. There has been too much inconsistent and poor management in children's services. For example, we know from the children's safeguards review reports and the shocking testimony of those young people who suffered abuse in children's homes that the risks for children living away from home in the 1970s and 1980s were seriously underestimated, but we cannot dismiss that as a problem of the past.

In the 1990s, evidence from the social services inspectorate and joint review reports of children's services showed continuing problems, and not only in children's homes. SSI reports and joint reviews have demonstrated inconsistency, both within and between authorities. They have sometimes shown that poor assessment, planning and case recording have led to very unfocused work with families, that decisions about who receives a service are often made on a haphazard basis and that poor planning for the children being looked after has resulted in unnecessary delays and inappropriate placements.

For all those reasons and more, in September 1998, we launched the "Quality Protects" programme, which is to help local authorities improve the management and delivery of children's social services. We announced that the programme would be supported by a £375 million new special children's grant, which is being paid to local authorities over the three years of the current spending review.

[Mr. John Hutton]

"Quality Protects" is part of our wider plans detailed in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services" to tailor services to the real needs of people and deliver them efficiently and to the highest standards. Today's public services have to be shaped around the people who use them, not the other way around. Social change, growing public expectations, an ageing population and shifts in family structures call for a modernised system of social care. That is why, when we launched "Quality Protects", we announced for the first time new Government objectives and specific targets for children's services. That major step forward has, for the first time, provided a clear framework in which to develop those crucial public services.

In particular, we want to provide protection and care for the most vulnerable children and families, which is precisely what the Care Standards Bill will do. The Bill has two key aims—first, to protect vulnerable people from abuse and neglect; and, secondly, to promote the highest standards quality in the care that people receive.

The Bill provides for the establishment of a new independent national body—the National Care Standards Commission—which will have significant responsibilities for safeguarding the welfare of children. All types of children's homes will be regulated and subject to rigorous inspections. Local authority homes that are currently exempt and small private children's homes for fewer than four children will be included. That loophole in the current law has long been considered a scandal, and rightly so. Good-quality care must be provided in all children's homes, whether in the private or voluntary sector, or in those run by local authorities. Children must be protected from abuse and their welfare promoted, whoever is responsible for running the home. In the past, problems have occurred in all types of homes, but in future, all homes will have to meet the same rigorous standards.

The Bill will introduce for the first time regulatory regimes for fostering agencies and residential family centres. The National Care Standards Commission will regulate the crucial and very specialised work of voluntary adoption agencies in a way similar to the current system operated by the social services inspectorate.

In recognition of its role in safeguarding children, the National Care Standards Commission will appoint a children's rights director, whose job it will be to ensure that children's rights and welfare are at the heart of all its responsibilities for regulating children's services. The children's rights director will fulfil a crucial function in developing the work of the commission in protecting and safeguarding the interests of the children being looked after by local authorities. We are also taking action on child protection.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): Will registration arrangements under the Care Standards Bill apply to children and young people in supported housing, but not in local authorities' formal care? I am thinking of vulnerable families placed in supportive environments who receive housing benefit. However, because they do so, they are not classed as receiving social care. Therefore, many such establishments—a large proportion of which do excellent work—fall outside the remit of the inspection regime. That is a lost opportunity.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman raised several technical issues. He is wrong about young people receiving housing benefit being excluded from receiving social care services. That is not the case. However, if the hon. Gentleman looked at the Bill, he would see that we are trying to provide a more effective regime for the regulation and inspection of children's homes—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman tells me that he has looked at the Bill. He should therefore see what the Bill's definitions relate to.

The hon. Gentleman asked about supported housing schemes. I need to consider what he might have been driving at, and I am more than happy to discuss the issue with him later. However, the Bill focuses on providing a more effective regime for children's homes and closing some of the loopholes that I mentioned earlier and that have given rise to considerable concern. As a matter of principle, it is not right that the protection that children and young people are entitled to expect from the care system should be determined by the size of the children's home in which they have been placed. We must ensure that all children's homes providing residential care are covered by the stronger and more effective arrangements in the Bill.

Two key developments forming part of the "Quality Protects" initiatives are the revision of the inter-agency guidance "Working Together to Safeguard Children" and the development of the new framework for the assessment of children in need and their families. The aim is to ensure that the way in which we safeguard and promote the welfare of children involved in prostitution and assess their needs is consistent with the approaches used for all children.

At the end of last December, following extensive consultation, the Government published new guidance on inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. "Working Together to Safeguard Children" replaces the previous guidance published in 1991 and takes full account of new research, experience and legislation relating to child abuse.

The new guidance emphasises the importance of agencies working together to help families and children before abuse and neglect take place. It provides a clear framework for social workers, the police, teachers, health service staff and others to work together and with families in order to secure the best possible outcomes for vulnerable children and young people.

The new guidance provides several essential safeguards against abuse which apply in every setting in which children live away from home. When services are not directly provided, basic safeguards should be explicitly addressed in contracts with external providers.

In September 1999, the Department issued new draft assessment guidance focussing on assessing the needs of children and their parents' and families' capacity to respond to those needs in the short and longer term. That guidance is underpinned by the latest knowledge of the impact of adult problems, such as domestic violence, alcohol and drug misuse, mental health and sex offending, on children's development. We shall publish the final version of the assessment framework in the next few weeks.

The new "Working Together to Safeguard Children" guidance and the assessment framework form important components of a wide-ranging programme of work across Government to strengthen protection for children and improve the support given to vulnerable children and families.

Earlier, I referred to child sexual exploitation and prostitution. The Government take seriously the threat posed by those who would exploit children for sexual purposes. There are no accurate national figures on the number of young people abused through prostitution. However, Barnardos recently conducted a survey of 48 agencies in England, Scotland and Wales. It reported being in contact with 55 young boys and 267 girls under the age of 16 and 94 young boys and 338 young women aged between 16 and 18 whom its staff believed to be involved in prostitution. Of course, the actual numbers are likely to be far higher than the figure of 750 in the Barnardos survey. It is therefore absolutely essential that we have a strong and effective system in place to protect children who are involved in, or at risk of becoming involved in, prostitution.

In December 1998, the Department of Health and the Home Office published draft guidance on children involved in prostitution which sets out a new multi-agency approach, based on local agreements, to address these problems. It establishes that the primary law enforcement effort must be against abusers and coercers who break the law and who should therefore be called to account. It stresses that children who are involved in prostitution and other forms of commercial sexual exploitation should be treated first and foremost as the victims of abuse. Their needs require careful assessment. The final guidance will be issued in the spring, but we know that a lot of excellent work is already taking place across the country.

Last month, for example, at the first ever social care awards ceremony at Lancaster house, I presented Nottingham social services with a prize. It was the overall national winner for its project on a multi-agency approach to child sexual exploitation. That ground-breaking project, which is a joint venture involving the police and local voluntary organisations, is preventing many vulnerable young boys and girls from ending up or being trapped in the world of prostitution.

Another important part of the Government's strategy is the preparation of the first national plan to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The United Kingdom was a leading participant at the 1996 Stockholm world congress to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. We agreed on an agenda for action, one of the key features of which was for each signatory state to provide a national agenda for action by the year 2000 with indicators of progress and set goals and time frames. We will meet that obligation in full. We consulted last year about what should be in the national plan. A steering group consisting of Government Departments, statutory organisations represented by the Association of Directors of Social Services and the Association of Chief Police Officers and wider voluntary organisations, including Barnardos and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, has been taking forward that work. We intend to publish the plan in the summer.

But protection is not enough. We must ensure that all children have the love, care and support that children need for the whole of their childhood and that the children for whom social services are responsible gain maximum life chances from education and other opportunities. In particular, we want to see looked-after children achieving more at school and more care leavers in training, education or employment; we want to see fewer moves between placements for children who are looked after by local authorities and the level of offending among looked-after children brought down. Where appropriate, we want to see children being adopted without undue delay and we also want to see better service for disabled children. Those are tough objectives, but we believe that they are achievable. Indeed, they must be achieved if we are not to continue letting these children down.

"Quality Protects" has been grasped with enthusiasm by all concerned. No one challenges the need to transform the quality of care and the chances in life of our most vulnerable children. The challenge for us now is to make that happen. In the programme's second year, the challenge for local authorities will be fully to implement their action plans, improve services and achieve much better outcomes for children and young people. Next year, we are increasing the grant from £75 million to £120 million and we expect to see real improvements delivered in return for those extra resources. In the third year of "Quality Protects", the grant will rise to £180 million.

The early evidence is that we are starting to deliver on our objectives. All authorities expect to be meeting their statutory duties to inspect children's homes by the end of March. We have also seen an increase in the number of adoptions and in the support that is given to care leavers. Increasingly, councils are listening to what young people have to say about their futures.

One of the key priorities for "Quality Protects" is to improve the supply and choice of placement options for looked-after children. One important choice is adoption. Research shows clearly that, in general, adopted children make good progress through their childhood and into adulthood compared with children who remain in the care system. Adoption provides them with a unique opportunity for a fresh start as permanent members of a new and stable family, allowing them to enjoy a sense of security and well-being that has so far been denied them in their young lives. The Department of Health 1998 circular "Adoption—Achieving the Right Balance" has had a strong impact on adoption practice. I am pleased to say that our monitoring shows that most local authorities have reviewed and taken action to improve their adoption services. I am also pleased that 200 more children found adoptive families in 1998–99 than in the previous year. That is approximately an 11 per cent. increase, which is good news; however, much remains to be done.

We recently launched the publication "Messages from Research—Adoption Now" which shows how adoption has changed. We know that there are now few babies needing adoption. We also know that many adopted children have faced great difficulties and that some are disabled. We are actively considering how we can promote more co-operation between statutory and voluntary bodies in this field. But we must also tackle the problem of delays in the adoption process on the part of local authorities and the courts. We have recently commissioned research on how we can minimise such delays. It will consider evidence from authorities with different records on adoption and it will also examine the role of the courts. At the same time, the president of the family division's adoption committee is looking at measures to reduce delays in adoption proceedings in the courts.

We must modernise our adoption service to meet new circumstances. We need modern standards of service from the moment that someone expresses an interest in being an adoptive parent through to post-adoption support. Such services must be quick, supportive and professional.

We also need to ensure that good-quality foster care is available. At the moment, despite the fact that there are around 32,000 existing foster carers, there is a national shortage. I am pleased to say that work is under way to develop the first national foster care recruitment campaign. It will be run by a steering group consisting of the Department of Health, the National Foster Care Association, the ADSS and the Local Government Association. That is an excellent example of how central and local government and the voluntary sector can work in partnership for the benefit of young people. I hope that the campaign will lead more people to consider taking up the unique challenge of caring for children from other families by becoming foster carers.

To support and supplement that work we have introduced, for the first time, national standards for foster care. We have asked local authorities to put more effort into better support and retention of our foster carers. Foster care can be a challenging and demanding task. Too many foster carers give up because of a lack of support. We must invest in ensuring that foster carers receive all the training and support that they need in order to gain and develop the appropriate skills. I am delighted to say that, in the first year of "Quality Protects", local authorities allocated nearly £30 million of the £75 million that was available to them in the grant to support their local placement and adoption services. That was money well spent and I am sure that it will continue to make a big impact.

I am also pleased that services for care leavers are starting to improve. For some time we have been concerned about the support that they receive from local authorities. Every year about 5,000 young people aged between 16 and 17 leave local authority care. There has been an increasing trend towards discharging young people from care early. The proportion of care leavers aged 16 to 18 who left care at the age of 16 increased from 33 per cent. in 1993 to 46 per cent. in 1998. That is a trend that we must reverse. It has resulted in too many children leaving care without a single qualification and too many being unemployed and homeless.

The Government believe that care leavers should be able to expect support from their parent—the local authority. That is why the Children (Leaving Care) Bill gives local authorities a new duty to assess and meet their needs, from their needs for the essentials of living—accommodation and maintenance—to their needs for development. Those needs will include needs for education and for training, any special needs and the ordinary needs that any child has when learning how to live independently: how to shop, how to manage a budget and how to cater for themselves. The Bill obliges local authorities to provide a young person's adviser and a pathway plan for all eligible young people. The latter will map out a route to independence for these young people, including a consideration of when they might be ready to leave care. There will no longer be any incentive to push young people out of care until they are ready to go.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): On that point, does my hon. Friend accept that the statutory age up to which young people leaving care are the responsibility of local authorities should be set at 21 rather than 18? Such an approach has been advocated by all leading child care organisations and by Sir William Utting, who spoke in support of it only last month. Does my hon. Friend further agree that statutory responsibility should be extended to the age of 24 for young people in higher education?

Mr. Hutton: I agree. My hon. Friend takes a close interest in these matters and he should remind himself of what we said in the document entitled "Who, Me, Survive Out There?" There are strong arguments for increasing the duty to cover young people up to the age of 21, but we have tried to make our position clear. As such a responsibility would be new and additional and would carry financial implications for local authorities, we would want to extend the current duty only when resources were available to deal with the new burden. I do not, however, disagree with my hon. Friend; of course 21 is the optimal age. The average age at which young people who are not being looked after by local authorities leave the family home is about 22. That must be addressed sooner rather than later.

As many hon. Members will know, beacon status has recently been awarded to four local authorities for their excellence in helping care leavers. The specialist leaving care teams in those local authorities have developed some excellent programmes. They are aimed at developing new partnerships with statutory and voluntary sector bodies to deliver high-quality services in housing, health and education. The authorities have also been developing innovative methods to assist care leavers in preparing and planning for adult life and have undertaken initiatives on education and employment for young people, which are aimed at providing basic skills training and intensive support to sustain young people on college and training placements. Finally, the authorities have been involving young people in shaping and influencing the development of high-quality local services.

We are determined that all authorities should give care leavers high-quality services. Local authorities were instructed to explain in their second management action plans produced under the "Quality Protects" programme how they were improving services to care leavers and putting in place plans to implement the new approach. The new arrangements for young people in and leaving care will link closely to the development of the new ConneXions service for young people aged 13 to 19, which was launched this morning. This new, joined-up, modern service will connect services provided locally to young people and will radically transform the support that they receive as they make the transition from adolescence to adult and working life. It will also raise the expectations and aspirations of young people of all abilities and from all backgrounds by ensuring that they receive the support and advice that they need to make a success of their lives, when and where they need it.

The new arrangements are a complex and ambitious undertaking that will require a lot of detailed and ground-breaking work. We are determined to build on what works best for the future. I am especially pleased that councils have begun to listen to children and young people in their areas. Listening to children helps to protect them from harm and low expectations. If children speak up and are heard, abuse is less likely to happen. Children and young people demand and need a voice in all decisions that are taken about them. That should apply not only to the big issues such as education, health and placements, but to day-to-day big issues such as pocket money, sleepovers and bedtimes. Young people can and want to contribute to making the care system more effective. Children's participation will help local authorities provide higher quality and more effective services. It will also help them to implement one of the key responsibilities under the best value requirements. Councils must become more responsive to the people to whom they supply services, including young people.

To practise what we preach, we are organising a series of regional events that will occur later this year and at which I and senior members of the Department of Health will hear directly from looked-after children. To plan the events, we are working with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the ADSS and a small project team of young people from A National Voice, the National Children's Bureau and Save the Children. The activities are designed to ensure that the views of children and young people on day-to-day issues such as pocket money, being listened to, finding a flat, support for learning at school and funding for higher and further education are heard. There will be separate discussion activities for adults. We should like the events to give children and young people locally a chance to hear about "Quality Protects" and local and national activities.

Improving services for disabled young children is a key priority for "Quality Protects". We know from inspections and research that disabled children receive a poor service. The Government also recognise the needs of parent carers of disabled children.

The Carers and Disabled Children Bill, which I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) for promoting—it has its Second Reading tomorrow—introduces direct payments for parents of disabled children to purchase the services that they have been assessed as needing. That will provide much greater choice and flexibility for those families.

Following an assessment of the needs of the disabled child and the child's family, the social services department will discuss with the family the options for receiving a service. They will be able to receive a service that is provided either by the local authority or by a provider that is commissioned by the local authority. In addition, instead of a service, the family can receive a direct payment to purchase a service of the family's choice. For example, following an assessment, it may be decided that the family should receive support to care for their disabled child. The local authority could offer a weekend break for the disabled child every other weekend or a direct payment to cover the cost of that service. We are confident that parent carers will find that a significant step forward, and that together the new measures will make a marked improvement in the support that is provided to parent carers.

I recognise that, for "Quality Protects" to be a success, authorities need to be able to recruit and retain staff. For "Quality Protects" and the whole social care modernisation agenda, local authorities and other employers need to be able to recruit and retain staff of the right calibre and number. A high-quality work force is essential to the delivery of high-quality services.

We are well aware of the concerns expressed in the media and directly to us by local government about the shortages of professionally qualified social workers and other care staff that jeopardise our modernisation plans and "Quality Protects" in particular. It is important to see that against a general background in which the social work work force has been fairly stable. The latest data show that vacancies for social workers are at the lowest level for a decade. Vacancies have declined from 10 per cent. in 1990 to 7 per cent. in 1998. Turnover rates over the same period have also declined from 14 per cent. to 8.5 per cent. Those overall trends mask particular difficulties in some service sectors and some parts of the country, which may be exacerbated by the demands of service developments like "Quality Protects".

It is the responsibility of local authorities in the first place to address their work force needs. The Government are not the employer. We are therefore particularly pleased that the Local Government Association has recently taken an initiative to set up a work force task group with the express purpose of identifying practical measures that can have a more immediate impact.

Dr. Brand: It was good to hear that the number of vacancies has fallen, but could the Minister tell me how many social workers were employed over the same period?

Mr. Hutton: I could, but not now.

It is true that the number of people who are enrolling for professional social work training courses is declining substantially. I think that applications have dropped by nearly 50 per cent. in the past six or seven years. That is a serious worry. Fortunately, the number of students who go on to those courses has remained broadly stable. It has fallen by about 10 per cent. But we need to do more; I am not pretending otherwise, and I shall say more about that later.

The Government have a role to play. It is not just the responsibility of local authorities. We are partners in the process. We have agreed with the LGA to build on this early work, and to work on a programme of action for implementation over a longer time scale together with wider employment interests throughout the whole social care sector, not just public authorities. We are, therefore, making arrangements for a work force summit to be held by the end of March. Among the issues to be discussed at that summit will be: addressing the image and status of social care, including conditions of service, family-friendly employment policies, and encouraging return to work among those who are professionally qualified as social workers, but who have left the profession for a variety of reasons; developing the existing work force, including the skill mix; and problems of recruiting students to social work.

The Government are already taking action to raise the quality of social workers and other social care staff. The Care Standards Bill, now being considered in another place, provides for the creation of the General Social Care Council. That body will have a statutory duty to promote high standards through codes of conduct and practice for all social care staff. We have already commissioned the initial drafting of those codes, and the council will have the necessary powers to ensure that social work training is fit for the purpose.

In the next few weeks, we expect to publish the reports of the external consultants whom we engaged to advise us on the content and delivery of professional social work training. We are currently considering our response to those reports, with a view to implementing a programme of substantial reform of professional social work training.

The Government accept that to build the ethos of excellence in social services that we all desire, we need the whole social care work force to attain the highest standards. It is salutary to remind ourselves that, of the million-strong work force in social care, 80 per cent. have no qualification of any sort. So low a level of qualification is unacceptable.

The essence of modernising social services lies in raising standards. We must have a new ethos of excellence, not excuses. We must drive up standards and drive out failure. At their best, social service authorities are capable of just that sort of excellence. That is why we shall shortly issue a quality strategy Green Paper for social services. The quality strategy is the Government's next step in a modernising agenda for social care. It will set a national framework for raising local standards, reducing unacceptable variations in practice and achieving an ethos of excellence in social services. It will build and consolidate existing initiatives to improve quality, two of which I have already mentioned: the National Care Standards Commission and the General Social Care Council. The quality strategy will propose the creation of a new institution to support the drive for quality and a social care institute for excellence. It will emphasise partnerships: with users and carers to define quality services; between the new and existing institutions in social and health care concerned with quality; and with local government and other stakeholders to develop and implement strategy, spread good practice and support change at local level.

In conclusion, "Quality Protects" is a key part of our strategy to raise the quality of social services. Through "Quality Protects", we shall work in partnership with local authorities and the voluntary sector to bring about the improvements that we need. This is a phased and monitored programme. There is no question of waiting until 2002 to achieve what must be done, because children cannot wait that long. We are taking action now to get the management and services right. Through the "Quality Protects" programme, we will help the most vulnerable children in society in ways that we have previously been unable to help them. Our expectations for such children have been too low for far too long, and we can no longer afford to let them fail because the future costs for them and for society as a whole are too great.

3.8 pm

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I am disappointed to see Westminster Hall so empty this afternoon for such an important debate. Perhaps it has something to do with the fact that the Waterhouse report, which will make an important contribution to the debate on children's services, is due to be published "shortly"—I believe that was the word that the Minister used in response to a written question from the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins). The information that I have from the House of Commons Library is that that report is due to be published on 7 February so, in some ways, it is unfortunate that this debate is taking place now. Had that report already been published, I am sure that the Chamber would be full. I expect it to prompt us to ask many questions, not necessarily in a party political way—I believe that debates in Westminster Hall are intended to be somewhat less party political than some others—but because, as the Minister said, as politicians, we must together try to do something about children's services, with their tragic history. I am sure that the report will raise important points, which we will want to debate.

Mr. Hutton: I reassure the hon. Lady that we do not intend to circumvent or truncate debate on Mr. Justice Waterhouse's report. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will make a statement, and there will be plenty of opportunities for hon. Members on both sides of the House to question him and raise other issues. The timing of today's debate has nothing to do with the publication of the Waterhouse report.

Mrs. Spelman: I accept that the timing of today's debate is an unfortunate coincidence.

There is no room for complacency in discussing children's services. I have had to come up to speed on this subject at fairly short notice and I was struck by the history of one inquiry after another investigating abuse of children in care. I was left depressed by that, and by the thought that, tragically, more may emerge. We shall probably have to deal with the outfall from serious abuse cases for many years.

There is no question but that the "Quality Protects" programme and the resources directed to it by the Government are helpful, and it would be churlish to say otherwise. It is still early days, but good progress is being made, above all in getting agencies to work together. Paramount is the genuine sense that the most important group in all this—the children—will be listened to.

The Minister, in a debate about the special grants for children's services under the "Quality Protects" programme in July, admitted:

> "More recently, social services inspectorate reports and joint reviews have demonstrated that the quality of children's services is inconsistent".—[Official Report, Fifth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 22 July 1999; c. 3.]

I went, for the most up-to-date statistics available, to the Department's website. The most recent figures in the bulletin of provisional statistics for children looked after by local authorities are for the year ending 31 March 1999. Sadly, they reveal plenty of inconsistencies. The average number of children looked after in the local population per 10,000 children is 47, but it varies from just eight per 10,000 in Rutland to 124 per 10,000 in Kingston upon Hull. We can readily understand that in terms of a correlation with social deprivation or social breakdown in different places, but I was much more alarmed by the variation that was shown in the quality of services.

The Minister has mentioned the concern that exists about the impact of frequent changes of placement for looked-after children. The Department has set a national target of 16 per cent. for the number of children with three or more placements in a year. My eye was immediately caught by the figure of 38 per cent. for my local authority, Solihull, compared with the national average of 19.3 per cent. for the year ending 31 March 1998. I looked into the matter and found that, although a small local authority might have the average number of available foster places, it would lack the range necessary to provide a good match. The lesson was learned that a small authority must strive for an above average number of foster places to get an adequate range. Matching is the key to stability in placing children, especially those aged 14 plus who are probably the most difficult to place.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Does the hon. Lady accept that there can be a problem with remoteness in larger authorities? Milton Keynes went from being under Buckinghamshire county council to being a new, much smaller unitary authority. Under the original arrangements, the problems had resulted from remoteness and the fact that decisions were taken well away from where people actually lived.

Mrs. Spelman: The hon. Gentleman knows better than I that a range of difficulties is associated with large authorities. But living on the shoulder of a large authority in Birmingham, I am well aware of such comparisons and contrasts. On balance, it is undoubtedly more difficult to provide quality services in larger authorities, and to deliver a joined-up approach within local government, because of the scale involved. The silo walls between departments somehow seem that much higher in larger authorities. The hon. Gentleman's point was well made.

I am pleased to note from the figures submitted to the Department on Monday that my local authority's change of strategy in seeking actively to increase the number of foster places available to get the good match has reduced the average frequency of placement among children in its care to the national average. It shows that lessons learned and applied can deliver the results needed.

The flow of children in and out of care reveals the lack of real progress made with older children, especially boys, who are the most difficult to place back in the community. I encountered a strange attitude to children aged 14 plus among the professionals who deliver the service. I was told that, in their view, it was inappropriate to try to place children in foster or adoptive care at that age. I find that attitude difficult to understand. In Northern Ireland, there is a unique register of the 50 older children a year requiring a family. By a proactive approach, it has proved possible to place children happily in an adoptive setting, even those aged 14 plus. We may successfully be able to apply lessons learned from Northern Ireland in other parts of the United Kingdom.

The lottery of provision can be harsh for the life chances of looked-after children. One of the major models for the purposes of contrast is local authorities that successfully place children with foster parents and subsequently find the children a long-term stable environment with adoptive parents. At the end of March 1997, nearly 11,000 children were placed in local authority care and in registered children's homes in England, but only 1,500 were adopted from public care. Almost half those came into care because they had been neglected or abused, and half were placed in care before they were a year old, half of whom were babies under one month. Four out of five were never returned to their natural parents. On average, children waited two years after coming into care before they were placed with families that would later adopt them. I am pleased that the number of adopted children has risen by 11 per cent. in the past year, but there is still a long way to go.

I challenge local authorities to become more proactive about helping children out of institutional care and into long-term, stable family environments. That might involve returning children to their natural parents with adequate support, or finding adoptive parents for them.

There is much in the expression "adequate support". I am sure that hon. Members will have had experience of constituency cases similar to my own. I had a case just last month of a child aged nine who suddenly appeared on the doorstep of his former neighbour. The child was barely clothed and without shoes, having run away from home after yet more physical abuse of the sort that the former neighbour had witnessed before the child's family had moved away. The child begged her to look after him. Social services became involved, and asked the neighbour to take the child in because no suitable foster place was available. She agreed to do that but, because she had three children of her own and was of limited means, she asked for financial provision for the child. She came to me because the financial provision was intermittent—she might receive a cheque but then nothing for another six weeks, which made it difficult to plan the household budget. She is aware that the child needs psychological help, and has flagged that up to social services. The child had had no formal education at school from the age of five. Social services holds her responsible for getting him to school every day, but it is difficult to keep him there. She is convinced that he needs psychological help, but it is not forthcoming.

Despite going through the hoops of all the checks to become a registered foster carer, she still does not receive the financial support that she was promised at the outset. That is a good illustration of the way in which, despite all the fine words, the system fails such people, as we practitioners on the receiving end of such circumstances know.

There have been repeated and urgent calls for an overhaul of adoption laws, to which we, the official Opposition, have added our voice. Adoption services vary widely across the country, as parents seeking to adopt are all too aware. The British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering was commissioned by the Department to study the adoption policies of 115 local authorities. Some had a strict policy of refusing foster carers the right to adopt children, even when they had a good settled relationship. Such an anomaly is difficult for the ordinary person to understand.

[Mrs. Spelman]

I have another constituency case that highlights the problem caused by the inconsistent application of rules between local authorities. A couple who already had four children of their own, but who regularly used to foster disabled children, were asked to take in a new-born baby because the young mother was unwell. They fostered the child for two years because of the delays that ensued over the suitability and capability of the mother to take the child back, and the uncertainty over the child's future.

Two years is a long time in a child's life. That time might be crucial for the child to establish a bond with the adults looking after it. The couple had fostered the child for two years and had come to the point of enfolding it into their family, although they had not wished to adopt at the outset. Having reached the perfectly intelligible human position of not wanting the child whom they had cared and loved to go through the experience of being torn away from the family, they offered to adopt. However, they hit the hard rule that, having been foster carers, they could not adopt the child.

Such anomalies make nonsense of the present adoption laws. I welcome the sign that the Government are considering harmonising some of the rules between local authorities. Parents on the receiving end of our adoption system are all too aware of the anomalies because they compare notes with people living in other local authority areas. They find that what has been denied them has been made available to friends or relatives in other parts of the country. The inequality by postcode must be seriously addressed.

The general lack of resources for recruiting potential adoptive parents from ethnic minorities is ill matched with the desired aim of social services to place a child in the adoptive care of people of the same ethnic origin where possible. The inconsistency must be examined.

The number of adoptions before the 11 per cent. increase was a quarter of what it was two decades ago. Children who entered care after the age of five waited an average of five years before being adopted. Many adopters find that they have little financial or other support for the children whom they have adopted. It is time to rethink the way in which children are treated in our system of social care. When the Waterhouse report is finally published, there will be important lessons to learn. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) will take a great personal interest in the outcome of that report, which he was instrumental in initiating when he was at the Welsh Office.

The Government will need to measure the proposals in the Children (Leaving Care) Bill and the Care Standards Bill against the failures that occurred in children's homes in north Wales. Naivety is a factor in the inadquate protection of children in care. It is born of the simple fact that normal people find it almost impossible to get their minds around the lengths to which the depraved will go to prey on children. Many of us in public life have been guilty of naivety in relation to the need to protect children more thoroughly.

The NSPCC is right when it says that the key to protecting children in care is independence. I support its call for an independent UK children's commissioner who has statutory powers to act as a child protection and welfare watchdog. How will the new UK children's rights director fit the role that the NSPCC envisages for an independent commissioner? Perhaps the roles are similar. I want the Minister to assure me that the director will be truly independent.

Indpendence is the key from the top to the bottom of the system. The NSPCC also calls for an independent visitor for all children in care. That person should be a safe, adult, trained friend with a child's best interests at heart. In another place, the noble Lord Hunt of Kings Heath gave the desirable specifications for people who might fulfil the role of a young person's adviser. The list included social workers, foster carers, teachers, careers advisers and, at the bottom, voluntary workers. The voluntary sector should not be marginalised from the independent role of an adviser to a young person. Many of the other people are seen as authority figures by children and are linked to the system that they believe has failed them. What about appointing properly trained adults who have been in care? They would understand what it is like. Having got out and got on with their lives successfully, they could offer a role model to young children that might help them to get away from the downward spiral of lack of educational attainment, unemployment, homelessness and crime that all too often occurs in life after care.

How independent are aspects of "Quality Protects"? As the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell) in last July's debate explained:

"One problem is that the same management who failed to tackle the needs of children in our area"—

Hillingdon—

"have also prepared the management action plans"—[Official Report, Fifth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 22 July 1999: c. 7.]

under the "Quality Protects" scheme. When a local authority is the substantial provider of care, it is imperative that the assessment of the adequacy of that provision is independent. Perhaps that could be provided by a neighbouring authority.

Another dreadful case of child abuse in residential care came to light by the intervention of a neighbouring local authority. A person who was appointed to run a children's home in the borough of Lambeth subsequently applied to be a foster parent in the neighbouring local authority area of Wandsworth. It was only when Wandsworth was making the customary checks that it was discovered that the applicant had a criminal record of sexual offence. It alerted the neighbouring authority to the problem, but it was a matter of years before anything was done. A conviction in court was successfully achieved only last year, in Liverpool. That is a salutary example of how exposed and vulnerable children can be at risk for long periods, even when a neighbouring local authority is aware of a problem. A large number of children suffered through the lack of independence in the process and it was a long time before the matter came to court.

The most important thing about the independent assessment is that it must be seen to work, and whoever conducts it must have teeth. That is where an independent commissioner would have a clear role. The care system may be safer today, but it is not safe enough. One abused child in care is one too many. We all have a responsibility towards children in care and we must do everything in our power to improve the present system and to ensure that we do not let them down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should inform hon. Members that a Division may occur at 4 o'clock. In such an event, I shall suspend our sitting for 15 minutes and ask hon. Members who wish to continue to participate to return promptly.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): It is a pleasure to speak in this debate in Westminster Hall. The opportunity to debate for some three hours a matter as important as children and social security, which would not in the normal run of events receive the scrutiny that it deserves, is welcome. Indeed, it is a shame that there are so many empty seats when we are discussing such a vital topic.

For 15 years before entering the House, I worked in children's services and latterly managed residential care, foster care, adoption and day care services for children in Lancashire. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) about the Waterhouse inquiry. It is obviously essential that the House should debate the report in full when it is published. I am glad, however, that today's debate precedes that inquiry.

In all of our discussions about children and social services, we are tempted to stress only the very real and serious problems of social care, but I should like to redress that balance in some respects. I do not know of any hon. Member who has come away from a meeting of the all-party group for children and young people in care and leaving care, of which I am chairman, without having been enormously impressed with the knowledge, ability, commitment and sheer intelligence and resilience of the young people who have attended and who have come through the care system. There are terrible cases of young people who have been failed and let down by that system, with disastrous results for their lives. However, we should always acknowledge, bearing in mind the parlous circumstances in which the care service has been, the many young people who have come through with courage, resilience, intelligence and fortitude. Such people have often made great successes of their lives and been a great credit to themselves. I shall not name the young people who have been involved with the group for fear of omitting some who have also made excellent contributions. Children and young people in care are a great resource; I look forward to their benefiting more from the care system and thus being able to give more to the country in future.

I want to say some positive things about people in social work. I winced when the hon. Member for Meriden was talking about institutional care, which brought visions of the workhouse and Oliver Twist. That is very far from the experience of the dedicated people who have given their lives to working in residential care, creating a homely, caring environment in ordinary streets and towns where some young people choose to be, rather than staying at home, going into foster case or being adopted.

It is important to reflect on the social work task when we consider the subject. It is tempting to say that all Members of Parliament do constituency work so we are all, in a sense, social workers, because we give advice. Recently, a teacher told me that social work was what teachers did in their free time after school had finished. I do not agree with those views of social work; the task is much larger than that, and fundamentally different from it. Social work is a craft and a skill. I was not good at it, but I know some people who are. They are people whom I respect absolutely; they listen well, with more than just their ears, they pick up subtleties, they are intuitive, they build professional relationships and they have an unconditional, positive regard for some of the most unlikely people.

Social workers keep an unerring eye on the best interests of a child when they are under pressure themselves from all sides, including their own organisations, and they do so even when they are verbally or physically threatened by other organisations. Social workers do the most delicate work with the most vulnerable people, helping them to face and sometimes to embrace the most difficult decisions that people will ever have to take, such as the decision to give a child up for adoption.

They have to decide when parenting is not good enough and a child needs to be removed from home, and when circumstances have changed enough for a child to go back home. They encounter the most vile abuse and neglect and stay sane and decent; they have a sense of humour and an ability to be creative and imaginative. They have to be able to write a report that clearly expresses the truth and to give evidence that stands up. They can put up with smart barristers and with ignorant, insensitive people who are in responsible positions. They can build trust with people who have every reason to be distrustful of them, of adults, of authority; they are people who can keep enduring, and keep on keeping on.

Good child care social workers should be well paid, intelligently supervised, properly valued and supported by employing organisations. They need first-class post-qualification training and time to recuperate and recharge. If some people that I know were listening to the debate, they would probably anticipate the sound of pigs' wings flapping through Westminster Hall, but until Members of Parliament show that they value social workers—I was so pleased to hear the Minister speak of the social care institute for excellence—we shall never have the high-class service that vulnerable children need.

Yesterday, I asked some former colleagues for their comments on the current situation in children's social services. I have also been reading the Children Act report, an excellent publication that summarises much of the research that has been carried out into the workings of the Children Act 1989 between 1995 and 1999. Some of the views that were expressed to me yesterday resonate with the views set out in the report. The report says:

"Commitment to working in partnership with parents was strong but sometimes led to excessive attempts to rehabilitate children home."

[Mr. Hilton Dawson]

That is similar to the view expressed to me that there can be too much commitment to partnership with parents, especially in cases involving drug or alcohol dependency. In such cases, workers feel that too much emphasis is often placed on the needs of parents, sometimes to the detriment of the children.

Mr. White: Does my hon. Friend realise that one of the problems that social workers encounter is trying to fit their priorities into the priorities of other agencies? Often, the most difficult hurdle to overcome is to get other agencies to recognise the issues that affect them.

Mr. Dawson: I certainly do recognise that and I shall return to that issue later.

Perhaps most worrying is the refocusing agenda. We heard from the Minister about how child protection services are being developed and revised in light of research findings, with a recommendation that there should be a refocusing of children's services away from what was regarded as an over-emphasis on child protection conferences and statutory child protection measures towards a more family-oriented and preventive service.

We are at an early stage in that process, but I have heard many concerns expressed that the refocusing of services is clouding the issues of child protection without necessarily helping children or parents. That may be related to issues of resources. Certainly, people talk about a lack of resources and a lack of trained social workers. People talk about the length and drawn-out nature of care proceedings and about an apparently genuine confusion about section 8 orders under the Children Act 1989. Apparently, in my constituency, there is no use at all of child assessment or family assistance orders. Of course, the Act is only as good as the local authority that implements it. That is only a snapshot, but it is a very recent one and one that comes from very experienced and capable people.

I promise not to take up the rest of the afternoon and to conclude my remarks by the time that we go to vote, but I think that the messages from inspection contained in this recently published report are instructive, and I should like to speak about some of them. In doing so, I shall come to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White).

The document speaks of an overwhelming impression of lack of strategic planning across local authorities. I can relate to that impression, bearing in mind the huge departments that deal with education and social services and which are based in the same local authorities but often appear to live in different worlds. Sometimes they will work with the same individuals but have completely different priorities and there will be a dramatic lack of communication. Even with a lot of good will, we must recognise the problems of trying to match the objectives of shire county councils with those of district councils, of co-ordinating the policies of health trusts with those of local authorities and of matching the different disciplines of psychology, psychiatry and social work amidst key procedures to protect children and to prioritise need.

What passes for policy making often ends up driven by finance rather than dealt with as carefully costed social work priorities. We should bear in mind the ease with which a fad or ideology can drive policy that should be rooted in the participation of children and parents and in the rich knowledge and experience of people at the coalface, who are doing the fieldwork in children's homes and foster care. Such policy should be driven by a Government who are committed to improving quality standards in care. A stifling bureaucracy and sheer lack of vision often undermine flexibility and creativity in local authorities. I am heartily glad that the Secretary of State has put local authorities on their mettle to plan and deliver much better services.

The Children Act report also mentions a lack of long-term perspectives in care plans and refers to crisis-driven work. In my experience, a lot of care work was crisis driven and done with an absolute emphasis on child protection. However, we have heard that, when services are refocused, sheer lack of resources, skill and flexibility often leaves worrying gaps through which children might fall.

One success story referred to throughout the Children Act report is family centres, which in my experience have been very successful. They can get closer to parents than statutory powers and can provide the skilled and intensive work that so many families need. We are still a long way, however, from achieving the networks of family centres that we must have. I was disappointed that the supporting families document, which was excellent in all other respects, signally failed to mention the role and work of family centres. I duly took the matter up with the Home Secretary.

Lack of long-term planning undermines placements and adoption, which is the epitome of careful planning and permanence. Adoption is a very important option for children and is easily the best way of catering for the long-term security needs of some children. I have placed children for adoption, and I do not suppose that I shall ever do anything more important. I have also assessed prospective adopters. However, I would not want adoption to be thought of as some sort of panacea as there are lots of other options. We need high-quality residential care. We have heard from the Minister about the importance of supporting foster care properly with better professional support and about the importance of financial support for foster carers. Local social workers need more opportunity, more time and more support to carry out the careful work with families and children that allows them to be safely reunited. The vast majority of children who enter care go back home. It is important to make that return home stick. Children cannot bounce in and out of the care system throughout their childhood.

There are serious concerns about adoption. Government guidance has been sensible and in line with what people would regard as basic good practice. In some quarters, there is the idea that social workers and local authorities are ideologically opposed to adoption. I do not know enough about social workers or local authorities to deny that, but I suspect that problems with adoption have more to do with the mundane reality of chronically overstretched social workers who have to deal with day-to-day priorities. Adoption is a difficult long-term process. It involves finding the correct adopters and making the placement, which is playing God in itself, and preparing children for that move.

We need a new Adoption Act. The Adoption Act 1976 predates the Children Act 1989. We should bring adoption firmly in line with the 1989 Act. There should be a statutory duty to provide better support for parents and children post adoption. Some of the worst cases are when adoptions break down. Adolescent years are often challenging. Adopted children might have an idea their parents are much better than the lot they have been stuck with. That is a real challenge. Those cases are tragic.

We need better support for all placements. Foster carers need training and realistic financial help. Residential workers should have real career prospects. They receive training, but unless they are absolutely dedicated, they leave the sector as quickly as possible to go into fieldwork. If they do not, they will end up working long anti-social hours. But residential workers provide the best opportunity to build long-term relationships with children and perform good, creative social work. Their role is fundamental to the system. Until we sort out that problem, the residential care sector will continue to be prone to scandal.

We do not have enough placements. The Minister talked about the reduction of placements for children aged 16 and over. That reveals a disgraceful statistic. In 1992, 12,200 children in placement were aged 16 or over; by 1998, there were only 9,400. Maths is not my strength, but that is nearly a 25 per cent. reduction in placements for children aged 16 and over. Thousands of young people have been ejected from care on to the streets or into inadequate accommodation. There is another worrying statistic. One local authority has 26 per cent. of its cases unallocated. It is creating an appalling rod for its own back because there is a child care tragedy waiting to happen.

The Government face a shocking legacy of neglect. There is a serious staffing problem. The service has been denigrated for too long, and is riven with crisis and scandal. We need to move on and I am so pleased to hear about the proposal for a work force summit. It is commendable that the Government are starting to address these issues.

There is provision in the Care Standards Bill for a general social care council, and new provision for training and post-qualifying training. "Quality Protects" enjoins all local authorities to be good corporate parents and reminds me of that universal measure of all things in social work for children—the question, "Would this be good enough for my child?" When that is taken to heart, it clarifies things right away. There is no stronger message to give to people in local authorities in positions of responsibility, so that they may be held accountable. We need serious investment. We need management action plans. We need the closest scrutiny of those plans and of the work of local authorities to ensure that they deliver and that, where they do not, someone else does. Some things need to go further. The commitment to care leavers needs to be developed now, not just at some unspecified time in future. The commitment and the investment in "Quality Protects" must go on and on and on.

Splendid initiatives such as A National Voice need to be encouraged. The voices of children and young people who are looked after should be heard in every local authority and throughout the Department of Health. It is great that the Government have employed young people from care in the Department of Health. That should be an exemplar for local authorities throughout the land. I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Meriden talk about the employment of care leavers as mentors and independent visitors to young people in care. There is a vast untapped resource of skill, experience and commitment. We should use that absolutely.

However, at the end of the day the Government need to emphasise that the profession of social work with children and families is good work, as well as hard work. Many people in it, despite all the scandals, the lack of resources and the problems, do great work. They can be encouraged to do even better and we can get more people to do more. I hope that we can attract many more to something so often vilified but which is an appropriate and rewarding career for the very best people in this country.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): It is an honour to follow the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) who spoke not only sensitively but with knowledge and common sense. That should be valued. I was especially pleased that as chair of the all-party group he reminded us that there are often good outcomes from care. We tend to forget that sometimes.

The Minister was right when he said that children are our future. How we treat our children determines our future. It is good to be reminded of the cycle of deprivation—of people who do not have the expectation of a job because their parents and grandparents did not have a job. The abused so often go on to be the abusers. Children treated as criminals often end up as criminals. It saddens me when I go around the prisons in my constituency, especially Camp Hill, to see how many inmates who are locked up for minor crimes come from a background in care or one where they were not cared for.

That is the theme of this afternoon's debate. It is about caring for those children. Being in care is a technical term and at times the care element has been missing. Children's social services, like all other social services, depend on teamwork between people of different disciplines and backgrounds. That is especially important for children's social services. There must be close relationships between education departments, health services and the police.

4 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.15 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have a bare quorum. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) was speaking when the sitting was suspended for the Division.

Dr. Brand: I was talking about teamwork, and I am sorry to have lost some of the team on the way.

The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre spoke about teamwork. We are often extremely good at producing joint strategic macroplans: indeed, everyone thinks that they are wonderful. Those plans are supposed to influence what happens in the various agencies that contribute to the joint planning process. My experience as a family doctor is that, on the whole, people working together at the client-patient level work brilliantly as a team, as they have a common interest in looking after individuals with certain needs. However, my experience is somewhat soured by the lack of a direct connection between the global strategic plan—which usually sounds so good—and the resources devoted to the work at the user-client level. There tend to be blockages at intermediate management level, where people hold budgets for individual resources. Despite all the fine words we hear in the House and the fine aspirations of joint planning, like a shuttlecock, individuals' needs are bounced between education, health and social work departments, often driven by police departments.

Matters have moved in a positive direction in the past few years. I commend the Minister on the initiatives that are being taken. I was ashamed to be a member of a community which, until 10 years ago, had no place of safety for an emotionally disturbed 13-year-old boy, apart from the local police station. The adult psychiatric services would not have him, and our only residential home could not cope with him. Being on an island, we could not ship him to a mainland unit that would take him then and there. Such an occurrence was not infrequent: that must be shaming for a society such as ours.

I am pleased to say that this debate is a sign that we are taking seriously the needs of our children and young people, but we still have some way to go. We are still overly driven by crisis intervention. It is right that a child's safety should come first. However, I sometimes worry about resources in children's units being concentrated on child protection teams rather than used to support and protect children and, more importantly, support families and children as a joint unit. Bewildering things happen to families once children or young people get in touch with or are allocated to a child protection unit. The children are safe, as they are taken into care or out of the difficult situation, but their families are often left without an advocate of their own. There are few opportunities for the families to access a social worker so that they can have things explained to them by someone who to them appears to be more neutral than the person who removed the child in the first place.

Changing access to legal aid may make it more difficult for people to get legal advice in a timely way, especially when very small children are taken into care when physical abuse is suspected. In a career of 20-odd years, I had two cases in which babies were taken into care as a result of non-explained accidental injury. Following a lot of legal advice, matters went to superior courts at a very late stage. That was because, initially, the parents did not know that, once their child had been in care and fostered for a little while, they were at risk of not being able to challenge an adoption decision. In both instances, further medieal evidence was submitted to demonstrate that there was a medical explanation for the possible injuries that were detected.

It is absolutely right that the safety of children comes first. However, resources must be available to ensure a balanced approach so that parents have access to advice and justice. Children are supported by the child protection team and local authority and have a guardian ad litem. Parents often have no one from whom to seek advice and frequently get into a catch-22 situation: unless they admit to something, they will not even be considered for a rehabilitation package with the child. In the majority of cases, that may be the right approach, but it is extraordinarily harsh in relation to cases such as the two that I mentioned. I genuinely believed those parents, although I do not have the skills that a social worker with more experience of such cases has. My findings were endorsed by the courts, yet those parents had been at risk of never seeing their child again. That is not right, so I hope that the Minister will tackle the matter.

Once children are taken into care, it is vital—especially for slightly older children—that the care assessment includes a diagnosis of the problem. Social workers are skilled in assessing the social make-up of a family and the risk elements within it. They also need to find whether the child itself has particular psychological or emotional needs so that an appropriate placement is made. At the moment, emergency action is often taken, a child is placed and it is hoped that the placement will work out. When difficulties associated with the child emerge, a series of placements starts in the hope that eventually the child will end up as a square peg in a square hole and be looked after.

Resources to assess children with psychological or psychiatric problems are desperately lacking. The tribal divide between psychologists and psychiatrists is an enormous hurdle. It is the exception to find a team that works together, rather than as two departments at war, each using valuable resources inappropriately, often not in the interests of the child, and competing with each other. I see some nodding heads, so my experience is not unique. The Department must address that matter. We must determine who should be the lead agency and how to encourage teamwork.

When the child is in care and, we hope, placed in an appropriate foster home, the future must be considered. I am much encouraged by the various initiatives in care management planning that are emerging. It would be helpful if that process were speeded up to provide uniformity in planning so that children taken into care by one authority could go to another after the assessment procedure, and people would know what language was being spoken. It is important to realise that, although fostering is excellent, it covers a wide spectrum of ways to fulfil needs. All foster parents are caring and universally motivated, but they do not all have equal skills or the aptitude, the time or economic resources to do the job. Opportunities are missed because various categories of foster parent may be treated differently.

I agreed with the Minister's predecessor who said that foster caring should be a vocation. That is absolutely appropriate in the majority of instances, but if a foster family is asked to take on one or two particularly difficult children with emotional or physical needs, they need to give more care than one would give one's own child. Those people should be compensated for their lack of employment opportunities and paid for the expertise that they acquire. It is not uncommon for those who have worked in our psychiatric or psychology services to want to help on a one-to-one basis and to foster children. Their expertise is an enormous asset. They can provide an alternative to placing a child in a residential home or an expensive residential facility for emotionally and behaviourally disturbed children.

I make a plea that we become more flexible about considering alternative placements. There is no reason why some residential schools could not be used for some children with particular learning or emotional difficulties, provided that the school can cope. That can often be much cheaper than waiting for arrangements to break down and placing children in specialist units which may cost up to £120,000 a year.

I also make a plea that we consider the role of grandparents. It is extremely difficult for grandparents to foster children. It is difficult to bring up children on a state pension. Grandparents are often the only relatives that the child knows, and such placements can often be appropriate. We all know of such examples from our constituencies. I know of a grandparent whose grandchild is in residential care in Birmingham, but Birmingham social services will not even assist the grandparent—or worse, will not ask Isle of Wight social services to assist the grandparent—to discover whether the placement would be appropriate. That is an extraordinary waste, not only of public money but, moreover, of an opportunity for the child. The boundaries, not only in departments and local authorities, but among local authorities, must be looked at.

Adoption is often the best permanent, stable solution for children. I agree with the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), that it is nonsense to preclude foster parents from becoming adoptive parents. It is almost as though a fostering stream is being protected without considering the fact that adoption is often an appropriate placement.

Mr. Dawson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the nonsense of having such an apparently strict rule, but does not he agree that there is a clear distinction between fostering and adoption, and that it is sometimes important to give foster carers a clear message that the foster placement that they are undertaking is not a prelude to adoption because that is not part of the child's care plan?

Dr. Brand: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. The problem is that there is another part to the equation: fostering should not involve the permanent care of a child—for two, three, four or five years—because that is extremely unkind if the option to adopt exists. Adoption must always be in the interests of the child, rather than in that of the service.

The Select Committee on Health studied the way in which migrant children used to be treated. The emotional, economic and other pressures that were put on parents to give up their children for adoption are horrifying. Such treatment is not unique to migrant children or to the past. Young women are still put under pressure. They are not told about the benefits that may be available and are pushed—perhaps not by social services departments, but by other organisations—to give up their children for adoption. I know that many women still feel guilty about having given in to the awful pressure that they were put under some 30 years ago. We owe those women an apology for not protecting them and allowing them to choose to look after their own child. Whatever happens to the benefit system, I hope that women will not be put in the invidious position of being told that the only way in which their child will be properly cared for is if they give it up for adoption. That cannot be acceptable in a country such as ours.

I was glad to hear the Minister say that his aspiration is to instruct local authorities to care for care leavers until the age of 21. I am afraid that I have gone off aspirations; people either do things or they do not. Merely to have that aspiration is disappointing, given that the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) gave a commitment to the Select Committee that the current situation was unsustainable and that any proper parent, including a local authority, would not abandon their children until they had finished further education. The money involved would not be great because of the other benefits and methods used to support such children.

There is not enough liaison between the policy making of the Department of Health and the decisions on local authority funding of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on the one hand and the Department of Social Security on the other. Because of the amazing complexity of the situation, we are in danger of gearing our care towards the most easily accessible funding stream. That is the thinking behind my earlier question.

With regard to the funding of supported housing for young care leavers, for example, if the excellent and well-thought-out foyer projects are to depend on housing benefit funding, they will not qualify as residential institutions—for want of a better word. The emphasis would not be on the supported element of the housing that they provide. It appears that they will not come under the supervision of the new inspectorate, which saddens me. These places ought to be giving social support to those who live there—that is their purpose—so they should be brought within those regulations.

We have talked about children who were formerly in care, but the title of today's debate is "Children's Social Services". There is a lot that social services departments, in conjunction with education and health departments, can do to avoid children being formally placed in local authority care. There are particular problems with children who have educational or behavioural difficulties because, as I said, there is still a lot of shuttlecock diplomacy, especially with children who have behavioural or autistic spectrum disorders. Education departments say, "It is not for us because it is not a special educational need", and social services say, "Well, they're in school, so it's not for us to support them." Those parents and their children are getting a raw deal because no one has thought out whose responsibility the children are.

I want to make a plea for the children of my relatives, friends, and neighbours. We sometimes forget that all children have needs, not just the unfortunate ones with special care needs. We need to have a little more input to meet the aspirations and needs of all the children in our communities, through youth clubs—although they are now a bit passé—and outreach workers for those who are involved in minor vandalism, drugs or glue sniffing. It is important that we put on the street people who are trusted by young people.

We must do something about allowing young people to make a noise and occasionally let their hair down. The best social provision in my home village is the bus stop, because it is the only place where they can all meet. They are a bloody pain sometimes, but when we complained that they had made a mess of the bus stop, they all turned up one Saturday morning and painted it. They have taken ownership of the bus stop because it is their social gathering place. Supporting that sort of thing informally is probably much more cost-effective than funding yet another youth club somewhere, which might give them access to social interaction one night a week.

We must become much more imaginative. It is good that the Minister and his group are travelling around the country. I suggest that he obtains slots on local radio and gets some of the more outrageous DJs to take part in the process, because until we hear what young people want—I do not know what they want, but I am always happy to listen—we will not target the often minor resources, which nevertheless have an enormous impact, as appropriately as we should.

Although the debate is about social services, I must commend our police authorities who often do much more imaginative work than our local authorities do through social services. They recognise the value of some of those extraneous activities that we middle-aged citizens might not necessarily appreciate and certainly would not want to take part in. There is a need for all young people to explore, find out about themselves and become the citizens of the future.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): I came here to ask my hon. Friend the Minister a brief question. I have no expertise in this and I am not driven by either support for or hatred of social workers, but given the topic and what my local authority has done I thought that I would expand my question into a few comments.

First, I welcome what my hon. Friend said in his introduction. There are a lot of positive initiatives, which I welcome. Like most hon. Members, I have heard horror stories. One of the key messages is that taking children into care has an impact not only on the child but on the rest of the family and the extended family, with all the attendant pressures. There was a group of families in my constituency whose children were taken into care. They got very angry about it and created a group called Families Fight Back, and a number of initiatives were started as a result. That brought home to me a number of the issues that have been raised today.

My local authority was one of the new unitary authorities created in 1997. In the run-up to the creation of Milton Keynes unitary authority and the transfer of Buckingham social services, we carried out a number of consultation exercises, which included children and young people. One clear message that emerged was that the old style of the social services department with its silo here, the education department with its silo there, and the housing department with its silo somewhere else was not the right way to organise things. We do not have a housing department, a social services department or an education department; we have a learning and development department, which brings together children, social services, education and economic development because they are all linked, and one person is responsible for it.

We then put adult social services in with housing, because there are many links between housing and adult social services. I believe that we are the only authority in the country to do that. Complications are caused because certain Acts require there to be only one director of social services. But the idea was to create a community of interests so that psychologists, psychiatrists and social workers were all in the same team and dealing with problems in schools. It was no surprise that, during the discussions, the then leader of the council and the current leader of the council—one a housing officer and one a teacher, who came from two totally different viewpoints—both came to the same conclusion. Ironically, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, who was the leader of the opposition, came to the same view, but from a health point of view. It was quite an interesting exercise in consultation and cross-party working. To be fair to the Tories, they also agreed the structure, so this is not an attack on them.

One interesting feature that emerged when the social services functions were transferred was that not all the children who were on the register had an allocated social worker—the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) was making. A report identified serious problems that the old shire county social services departments had created over the years. One of the lessons of the creation of unitary authorities and smaller social services departments is that those who carried on the old shire county social services continued the problems into the new unitary authorities. Research needs to be done into that changeover and the opportunities, missed or taken, in the reorganisation of a social services department.

One of the critical points to emerge was that the IT systems were just not up to date. One lesson that I learned was that the investment that was required was needed several years ago, but it must be made available now. I have nothing but praise for the vision of the senior managers of the new authority, who are bringing educational practitioners and social workers into that way of working which crosses and breaks down boundaries.

Interestingly, the hospital trust, the community health trust and now the new primary care group, which is going for trust status, together with the local social services and education departments, have created something called a health forum. It has joint chairs and will tackle issues of cross-departmental and cross-organisational partnership. Although Utting recommended that, unfortunately the Government chose not to accept his recommendation. Perhaps, however, there is hope for the future.

That link with education is important, as is a link into economic development. It is not just about being in schools; it is about jobs and the quality of life. Families that have jobs and are prospering have much better life chances than those with the problems that were being picked up by social services. It is critical that organisations, such as the new learning and skills councils and regional development agencies, link back into what children's services are providing. Too often, they think only in terms of their own area, but learning and skills councils can provide tremendous opportunities for 16-year-olds, for example. They must not be allowed to neglect children in care, or to disregard the input that children's social services can make. I hope that when the Government set out the terms of reference for learning and skills councils, they make that point.

One of the problems that many authorities have had over the years is the loss of funding for youth services. I entirely agee with the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) that many local authorities have had to switch resources from youth clubs to outreach work and community development. Again, in my experience, that leads to innovative ideas on the ground about how to get young people to interact socially. There are various examples of such ideas throughout the country, but it is important that the informal links that tend to be created do not get lost in regulations; they should be encouraged. The Government's best value programme for local authorities will be a tremendous opportunity for the user's voice to be heard so that the necessary synergies can be created.

More problems arise from the fact that many placements are made away from the local area. This comes back to the point that the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) was making about social services. Out-of-town or out-of-county placements can cause real problems, particularly when children are continually moved from authority to authority. The point has already been made, but we must tackle that problem. Although I welcome the fact that targets are to be set, many social services departments have not yet got to grips with this.

Another problem, which Families Fight Back brought to my attention, is the speed of the courts in decision making. There are feelings of isolation, loss and of not knowing what is going on when cases go to court. Moreover, people often do not understand the consequences of decisions that are taken around that time. Families who have made decisions for the best of reasons find, six or nine months down the line, that those decisions have unexpected and unintended consequences. Communication at that early stage of involvement needs to be worked on.

As I said, Families Fight Back was created by families whose children have been taken away. It began with a whinge: "The local authority's terrible; it's taken my kids away." Then the local authority, in conjunction with Families Fight Back, entered into a project, supported by NCH Action for Children, to create an advocacy group for families going through that process. Many lessons have been learned by the local authority's social services department and other sections. The project is still running. The key matter to have emerged so far is the lack of support for families, which leads to children being taken away. It is critical that advocacy and support for families and children, and the impact on friends and relatives are taken into account.

The Minister mentioned sure start, which is a brilliant scheme promoted by the Government. Unfortunately, that scheme is limited to pilot areas and two roll-outs. It has yet to reach the whole country, so many people have not seen it and are saying, "What's sure start got to do with us?" I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister takes note of that, as it is critical that the Government speed up the roll-out of sure start so that it goes to every part of the country. It has real benefits which are not yet reaching everyone.

Partnership is a key word in our debate. It is not just a buzz word, but represents a genuine challenge. It is easy for the Government to change policies, but extremely hard for them to alter an organisation's culture. Sure start is about changing the culture in which children's social services operate. We should not underestimate vested interests or the resistance to change. We must recognise the benefits of changing a culture. Even when we do not seem to be achieving our goal, we must push on.

The question of poverty was raised earlier. A key problem in my constituency is the large number of people who are not on income support, but are on an income level just above that. They, therefore, do not get access to child care tax allowance or income support housing benefit, and have serious problems with available support. The change from income support to the income level just above it poses a critical challenge to the Government. I am sure that they will address it, but it is crucial that children in those families get the support that they need.

I mentioned the isolation in the project that I described. That isolation was physical, as some families were from rural areas and felt isolated from the town. We must improve how we tackle the social services' role in dealing with children from rural areas. Since Norman Tebbit famously spoke about "getting on your bike" and finding a job, family circumstances have changed. Families are often isolated. They live a long way from their extended family and their roots may give rise to difficulties. Coming from Milton Keynes, which is built on that premise, I am more aware of the problem than others, but in many areas, the lack of family support is a serious concern. Isolation within the family and not being able to talk to people is also a problem and should be tackled.

I am anxious about the role of guardians ad litem, whom it is difficult to recruit. That narrows the experience and breadth of such people, as only one social class or a particular type of person applies for such a role. I am anxious that we should increase the number of people who are prepared to be guardians ad litem and improve their support and training.

One of the best initiatives introduced by the Home Office concerns parenting skills and parenting orders. The project showed that parents do not have enough support. Many problems would not have existed if they had had decent parenting skills, but they had nowhere to turn to in order to acquire them. There are a few such facilities in the mediation services and the voluntary sector, but many families do not know that they exist when they need them or when they would be of most benefit, and thus they repeat their mistakes time and again. We need to break that cycle.

The Government proposal is part of the modernising government agenda. Issues affecting children should be based on proper research and on the facts, as the recent Performance and Innovation Unit report stated. It is crucial that research on the matter continues to be up to date and that decisions are taken, and policies made, on the basis of that research.

It is important that all Government Departments sing from the same hymn sheet. The Home Office and the Department of Health have taken a good lead, as has the Department for Education and Employment, through its early years learning programme. On the receiving end, each initiative has 90 per cent. commonality with the others, but there are some matters on which that commonality is lacking, and confusing messages are being sent. It is crucial that the modernising government agenda ensures that Departments' initiatives are co-ordinated, so that any confusion, or overlap, is eliminated. Massive strides have been made in that respect since the Government took office, but there is more to be done.

Mr. Dawson: Does my hon. Friend accept that he is making a powerful case for a children's rights commission to bring together initiatives relating to children, to be a focus for children's rights and to ensure that Government action is co-ordinated?

Mr. White: I would come to that conclusion, if I had my hon. Friend's expertise. He has long championed the case for a children's rights commission, which was taken up in the report of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. I agree with his suggestion.

I conclude by saying that I am saddened by press vilification of social workers. Whether or not they take a child into care, they are accused of getting it wrong. Social workers must be more valued and the difficulty of their job must be recognised. It is important that action is taken in partnership. When the Minister introduces regulations in the national framework, he should allow scope for local diversity to deal with the conditions in each locality and with local innovation. It would be a shame if there were no such innovation from the bottom. I hope that the Minister will accept the need for local innovation and diversity.

Mr. Hutton: Only four other hon. Members have taken part in the debate and they have all made high-quality contributions, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). There is no substitute for front-line experience; he has that in spades, and it showed.

Several important messages and themes emerged from the debate. One issue that we are trying to grapple with and to make progress on is the years of indifference towards children's social services, which are crucial. For all the reasons that hon. Members identified in the debate, they have not received the attention, in terms of policy development and of resources, that they have been crying out for for years. The touchstone—the crucial area—where deficiencies have repeatedly been displayed, is the public care system. For many years, insufficient attention and resources have been given to children who are looked after by local authorities, and Governments have failed to deal with the matter satisfactorily.

I take comfort from what has been said today, and what social services departments throughout the country tell me, that we are beginning to turn a corner. The consensus is that we have a long way to go, but we have made a start and I am confident that the "Quality Protects" programme will make a lasting difference to how children's social services are delivered. It is not just in the public care system that children's social services need to be transformed and modernised; there are a range of different scenarios and areas, some of which have been alluded to by hon. Members, where a change is needed in how care is delivered.

We must consider how to link the delivery of children's social services with crucial, front-line public services and services delivered by voluntary organisations. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) spoke eloquently about the changes in the local authority in his constituency. There will be further such changes in the next five to 10 years. There will be a significant broadening of the way in which social services are delivered both for children and other client groups, and that will be very exciting. The best type of service delivery, as the hon. Member for Isle of White (Dr. Brand) said, can make connections between different key services, such as education, health and social services.

The hon. Members for Isle of Wight and for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) spoke of their worries about mental health services for children. I did not refer to that subject in my long opening speech, so I shall do so now. We are investing £90 million in the current spending review period to provide a basic capacity in core child mental health services, which do not exist in some parts of the country, as the hon. Gentleman said. That is a tragedy that has ruined the lives of many young people who have not been able to use those services.

As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight and others said, the best way to deliver those services is in a spirit of partnership and co-operation in the statutory sector. We want social care and health care professionals to work together, not in isolation. They should spend more time crossing the boundaries that exist between the two services rather than patrolling them. When staff spend their time patrolling the boundaries, we do not get the service delivery that we expect and which young people should receive.

Much wisdom and common sense have been shown this afternoon about these important issues. In addition to trying to focus attention on developing children's social services in a consistent and coherent way for the first time, we are trying to make connections. That is why the new support service will be a very important development, why our initiatives on child and adolescent mental health services are central and why some of the other changes that hon. Members have referred to will be important. We want primary care to be increased and to be delivered in conjunction with social services and social care. That is a sensible model and we are hopeful that there will be progress in all those areas.

I shall refer briefly to specific matters that have been raised in the debate. The hon. Member for Meriden referred to her anxieties about adoption law, and the case for reform. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre also referred to that matter when he called for closer co-ordination in the application of the Adoption Act 1976 and the Children Act 1989. Notwithstanding some of the difficulties that have been expressed, there are grounds for optimism. I am not entirely convinced that there is something fundamentally wrong with the construction of the adoption law. I understand the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre about the need for closer synergy between adoption law and the Children Act 1989, but we are right to focus on the practices used in social services departments as there are a number of areas where improvements can be made.

The Government have never ruled out the need for change to the Adoption Act 1976, and we have an open mind about that. In the meantime, we are trying to focus attention in social services departments on improving adoption practice. There have been many regrettable examples in which that practice was not right and in which ideology has got the better of common sense. We must find a way of ensuring that that does not happen in future. Many hon. Members have made it clear that the only interests that we should serve in adoption issues are those of the children. There are no higher interests at stake, so we must ensure that the children's interests come first at all times.

The hon. Member for Meriden expressed concerns about the quality and adequacy of the management action plans that are being prepared in the context of the "Quality Protects" programme and called for an element of independent inspection. I assure her and other hon. Members that, as part of the prcoess, the management action plans are scrutinised independently by officials in my Department, including the social services inspectorate. We have a network of new regional development workers who work closely with local authorities to ensure that management action plans are of the right quality. We have repeatedly made it clear to local authorities that if the plans are not satisfactory there will be no question of paying the grant. We shall not make grant allocations unless we are satisfied that the plans are sufficiently robust, and local authorities understand that. None of the management action plans failed that test the last time that they were considered, and we do not want any to fail this time. We want the benefits of the "Quality Protects" progamme to be felt in every local authority in the country. As I said, we have told local authorities that there will be no question of paying their grants if their management plans are not up to it. I hope that the hon. Member for Meriden will be reassured about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre expressed concerns about the working together guidance. I assure him that there is no question of those working together procedures diminishing the focus on child protection—I will not let that happen. We consulted widely on the amended working together guidance, and I was reassured to see that it drew strong support from the organisations consulted, including local authorities and children's organisations. We made a great effort to ensure that there was no such lack of focus. I am pleased also with the response given to the guidance by social services and other interested organisations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre made several good points about residential care workers, especially in relation to the importance of children's residential care workers. We recognise that imporance, which is why we are introducing a new post-qualification award for residential children's services. That is a very important initiative. At a wider level, we must build into social services a lifelong learning and training culture. I do not think that such a culture has been in place, which is one of the most substantial weaknesses in social care and must be addressed. Many hon. Members will be aware that the training organisation for personal and social services is currently consulting on a new national training strategy for social services, in which we are taking a close interest. It is an employer-led strategy, which is perfectly appropriate, as it deals with responsibilities that are ultimately for employers.

It is a priority to improve the qualifications of the social care work force as a whole, especially in the area identified by my hon. Friend. That must be seen as part of a national effort to improve the training infrastructure in social care so that on-going career development and training will become the norm for social care professionals as it is for other care professionals. People working in the field of health care would also accept such a need, and we are working with health profession bodies to ensure that such a system becomes better established; the same logic applies to social care. I think that my hon. Friend and I are at one about that.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight asked me about the number of social workers and I can reassure him about that. In 1988, there were 28,000 qualified social workers or whole-time equivalents in England, and in 1998, that figure rose to 33,500, so we are making progress. However, there are concerns about certain parts of the country and certain specialisms, where it is right for both employers' organisations and the Government to work out how to address the problems. I accept that one of the background issues that we must consider and resolve is the poor image of social workers. Social workers always get the blame when things go wrong and they very rarely get the credit when they take the right decisions. We must strike a better and fairer balance, certainly in the press and in the House, in recognising the achievements of social care, which are many.

Today we have spoken about children and social services and, in my opening remarks, I emphasised the outstanding work that has been done in Nottingham by the police, social workers and other agencies, working together to rescue children from child prostitution. That is the most miserable and evil trade but, working together, Nottingham social services, the police and other agencies have saved dozens of young boys and girls from that wretched life. We should celebrate that and recognise and reward that sort of work where we can. That is the sort of effort that we need to make to promote social care as a noble and caring profession, which is crucial for a decent society.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight raised certain concerns about partnership working. I hope that I have resolved those issues. I agree with him about the need to improve support for foster carers. In particular, we need to consider how we can support foster carers out of hours, because it is not much help to foster carers to find that they cannot obtain support if things start to go wrong at 9 o'clock at night. We are considering how we can improve those services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East referred to changes in the way in which social services are being delivered. Those sound like promising developments, which we will follow with interest, but it struck a chord with me when he said that we needed a change of culture. I agree with him. We need a change of culture not only in children's services but across the board. Wherever possible, we need to get away from the "council knows best" paternalism that does not encourage independence or allow people to take control of their lives. Good social care professionals are not in favour of either of those results; they do not want to trap people in dependency and they want people to take more control of their lives. In framing legislation and policy, we must ensure that we give front-line professionals the tools to do their jobs more effectively. I agree that resources are part of the solution, but so are policy, legislation and inculcating and developing the proper culture and practices.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre was very supportive of our plans to establish a new social care institute of excellence. That will have an important role in spreading good practice and establishing an authoritative central body to help solve problems on the front line. In general terms, this has been a positive and constructive debate. We have much to do and we are not in the position from which we would like to start—something that is especially true of the public care system—but we must start from here whether we like it or not. We are making progress and the Government want to continue that progress, not for the sake of the organisations and services involved, but for the sake of young people because we in the House have a moral and ethical responsibility to promote their welfare at all times and in all places.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes past Five o'clock.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Senator Pinochet

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Solicitor-General what request the Spanish authorities have made to the Crown Prosecution Service to seek leave for judicial review of the Home Secretary's decision in respect of Senator Pinochet; and if he will make a statement. [106408]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service is acting as the agent of the Kingdom of Spain in relation to the conduct of the Spanish request for the extradition of Senator Pinochet. It would therefore be inappropriate to reveal details of any instructions received in relation to this matter since The Crown Prosecution Service is under a duty to preserve solicitor-client confidentiality. It is for the Kingdom of Spain to release any details of their instructions to the Crown Prosecution Service.

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Service Press Officers

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will institute an inquiry into the reported remark by a civil servant to an Evening Standard employee concerning the consequences of the health correspondent continuing particular investigations; and if there are official guidelines concerning the acceptability of such remarks. [106037]

The Prime Minister: The Department of Health has already looked into the matter referred to by the hon. Member. I am fully satisfied that the press officer concerned behaved in accordance with the standards expected of civil service press officers.

A Working Guide for Government Press Officers states that:

"It is the duty of the Press Officer to present the policies of his or her Department to the public through the media and to seek to ensure that they are understood."

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to answer questions on the different Government charges and taxes on students at universities throughout the United Kingdom. [105979]

The Prime Minister: Ministers will answer on issues for which they are responsible, in line with the resolutions of the House on 25 October 1999.

Responsibility for the funding of higher education in Scotland and Northern Ireland lies with the relevant devolved executive. Ministers will answer questions which relate to decisions which the devolved executives have taken, only to the extent that these have an impact on the Government's responsibilities.

EU Charter of Rights

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if the Charter of Fundamental Rights will accord new rights not currently granted in common law. [106281]

The Prime Minister: There is no agreement that it should do so. The Cologne Conclusions state that:

"fundamental rights applicable at Union level should be consolidated in Charter and thereby made more evident".

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on including rights of (a) free speech, (b) free association, (c) the existence for political parties and (d) trade union (i) existence and (ii) membership within the Charter of Fundamental Rights; [106279]

(2) if he will make a statement on his Government's policy on including (a) the right of asylum, (b) age discrimination, (c) social rights, (d) education rights, (e) health rights, (f) social security rights, (g) immigrants' rights, (h) same sex partnerships' rights, (i) women's rights, (j) children's rights, (k) economic rights, (l) cultural rights and (m) disabled people's rights in the Charter of Fundamental Rights. [106280]

The Prime Minister: Work on the draft Charter has just begun. It is not possible to say at this stage how the drafting body will approach the question of inclusion of the above categories. The Government will wish to explore the best way to profile existing rights in a way which reflects the Cologne Conclusions and the nature of the current application of those rights in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the financial consequences of the adoption of a Charter of Fundamental Rights for (a) industry and (b) government; and if he will make a statement. [106377]

The Prime Minister: The Government see no reason for the Charter to add to existing rights and obligations, nor is there agreement that it should so do.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what anti-discrimination enforcement measures will be included in the Charter of Fundamental Rights; and if he will make a statement. [106376]

The Prime Minister: It is for the Charter drafting body to consider how, if at all, such measures should be included.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the withdrawal of voting rights of a member state deemed to be in breach of the Charter of Fundamental Rights under the Treaty of Amsterdam as modified, under Article 13. [106399]

The Prime Minister: Article 7 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU) sets out the circumstances whereby the Council can consider suspending certain rights deriving from the TEU, including voting rights, should they determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a member state of principles mentioned in Article 6(1) of the TEU. This says that the Union

> "is founded on the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of lay, principles which are common to the Member States".

There is no agreement that the Charter of Rights should give rise to action of that kind, or that it should be incorporated into the EU/EC Treaties.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister which body will be the final arbiter on questions on interpretation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. [106389]

The Prime Minister: The Government want a non-justiciable Charter which makes existing rights more visible. Where those rights are justiciable elsewhere, the relevant source instruments (for example, the European Convention on Human Rights or the EU/EC treaties) will continue to be interpreted in the usual way by the appropriate institutions (for example, the European Court of Human Rights or the European Court of Justice).

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those areas of potential qualified majority voting raised to date by (a) EU member states, stating the country in each case and (b) the Commission, as areas for negotiation at the forthcoming Intergovernmental Conference, in which the Government have not insisted on retaining unanimity. [106165]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 416W.

EU Membership (Cost-benefit Analysis)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what cost-benefit analysis of UK membership of the European Union the Government have undertaken. [106401]

The Prime Minister: The Government are clear about the benefits to the United Kingdom of its membership of the European Union. Membership of the European Union brings significant benefits to the British economy. Over half our trade in goods is with the EU, with eight of our top 10 trade partners in Europe. In 1998 trade in goods was worth some £95.4 billion. Membership gives us access to a single market of 372 million people—the largest and richest market in the world. Over three and a half million jobs are directly linked to trade with the EU with thousands of jobs being created as a result of Britain's position as the gateway to countries outside the Union. The UK is now the top location in the EU for foreign direct inward investment. At the same time we benefit as consumers, with Single Market competition bringing lower prices and greater choice, and the Single Market rules ensuring proper protection for consumers. In addition, we have secured European Structural funding worth £10 billion for 2000–06 for regeneration and economic development in the UK regions. Our farmers also benefit from the £5 billion a year in aid under the Common Agricultural Policy.

Iran

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 18 January, Official Report, columns 416–17W on the Iranian Foreign Minister, if he will define the countries in the area of strategic importance to the United Kingdom mentioned in his answer. [106568]

The Prime Minister: Iran and her neighbouring countries represent an area of strategic importance to the United Kingdom for a number of reasons. Among these are the region's history of political instability and conflict, the importance of the region for world energy resources, and its position across important global communications routes. Iran also straddles the major route by which heroin reaches the United Kingdom from Afghanistan.

Criminal Assets (Confiscation)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to publish the Performance and Innovation Unit's study on the confiscation of criminal assets. [106409]

The Prime Minister: I expect the Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU) to complete its study on the Pursuit and Seizure of Criminal Assets by the spring. Decisions flowing from the PIU's work will be made public in the normal way.

Liberal Democrats (Co-operation)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to issue a new joint declaration on co-operation with the Liberal Democratic Party. [106722]

The Prime Minister: None.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the staffing levels of the RUC Special Branch in September 1994 and September 1999 in total and broken down (a) into component operational units, (b) by grade or rank, (c) by perceived religious or community origin and (d) by gender. [101882]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 December 1999]: For the information to be provided fully in the form requested would identify the religious or community background of individual officers and would therefore breach statutory confidentiality. The following tables show the numbers of officers by rank at 30 September 1994 and 1999 and the gender and the community background of officers in the Department at 31 December 1994 and 1998 (the latest figures available).

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what positions, rank and postings were held by the Chief Constable of the RUC in each of the years 1988 and 1989. [105654]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: In 1988 and 1989 the Chief Constable was a Detective Superintendent stationed at RUC Headquarters.

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the items in the National Asset Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 25 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104495]

Mr. Ingram: The amount of items in the National Asset Register sold since 25 February 1999 is £988,860.00.

Ruskin College, Oxford

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in each of the past five financial years, how many students from Northern Ireland have attended Ruskin College, Oxford. [105277]

Mr. Mandelson: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Rosemary Nelson

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the written threats issued against Mrs. Rosemary Nelson were passed to the Minister of Security's office by the Committee on the Administration of Justice. [103818]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Committee on the Administration of Justice wrote to me on 10 August 1998.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps were taken by the Government to ensure the safety of Mrs. Rosemary Nelson. [103820]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Government sought assessments from the RUC on Mrs. Nelson's security on two occasions, February and August 1998. On each occasion the RUC determined that they had no intelligence to substantiate a specific threat to Mrs. Nelson. Following the RUC's reply to our August inquiry we wrote to the Committee on the Administration of Justice on 24 September 1998. My office replied to their queries about how Mrs. Nelson could apply for inclusion in the Key Persons Protection Scheme and for the provision of a personal protection weapon. We also suggested that she may with to seek the advice of her local Crime Prevention Officer in relation to security advice at her home and at her work place.

Patten Commission

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many written submissions were received by the Patten Commission; and if he will place these documents in the Library. [105475]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The number of written submissions received by the Patten Commission is a matter for the Commission itself which was independent of Government. In their Report (para 2.3 page 11) the Commission advised that they received approximately 2,500 individual written submissions in addition to a number of petitions signed by several thousand people and several standardised letters. The Government are not in possession of these submissions and are not in a position to place the documents in the Library.

Street Signs (Vandalism)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) Irish language and (b) Ulster Scots street signs have been damaged or stolen in each district council area in the past 12 months; what legal sanctions are available in respect of acts of vandalism; what guidelines have been issued to the police to assist in the prevention of vandalism; how many persons have been charged with offences concerned with bilingual signs in each district council area; and what was the outcome of the prosecution. [105459]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Not all of the information requested is retained in a form that would permit details to be extracted without incurring a disproportionate cost.

Vandalism of this nature is recorded as Criminal Damage, which covers a wide range of offences and forms an important element of RUC training supported by operational documents. If the cost of the damage is less than £400 under the Summary Jurisdiction Act (NI) 1953, the penalty may be up to six months imprisonment or a Level 3 fine. If the cost of damage exceeds £400, the penalty under the Criminal Damage (NI) Order 1977 may be up to a 10 years imprisonment on indictment or up to two years on summary conviction.

Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken by the Northern Ireland Office to prepare for the implementation of the Human Rights Act 1998 in Northern Ireland; and what specific training opportunities have been organised. [103824]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The Human Rights Unit in the Northern Ireland Office co-ordinates the Department's preparations for the implementation of the Human Rights Act.

A human rights seminar, organised by the Northern Ireland Office, was held in June 1999. It involved the main criminal justice organisations and players in Northern Ireland, including non-statutory bodies. Its aim was to generate a heightened awareness of issues surrounding the Human Rights Act, contribute to a common understanding of the issues and provide an opportunity to discuss new concerns and discern where a common approach was required.

The Northern Ireland Office has also explored any vulnerabilities in legislation and action has been taken—or will be taken—wherever necessary.

Senior officials and other key staff have attended half-day awareness sessions run by The Queen's University, Belfast. Legal groups are also working with the University to provide more in-depth seminars to legal staff in the Department of the Director of Prosecutions for Northern Ireland and the Crown Solicitor's Office.

An inventory of remaining training requirements is currently under way. All staff are to receive general awareness training, which is to be supported by more detailed training on aspects of the Act which tie in to their specific job needs.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reasons the Northern Ireland Office is not participating in the Government's Human Rights Task Force. [103825]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The composition of the Task Force is a matter for the Home Secretary. The Chief Commissioner of The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (which is funded by the Northern Ireland Office) is represented on the Task Force. On 18 January 2000, I made a presentation to the Task Force, outlining the strategy of the Northern Ireland Office for implementation of the Human Rights Act.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what training (a) has been undertaken and (b) is planned for the future, relating to the Human Rights Act 1998 for (i) the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions and (ii) the Northern Ireland civil service. [103831]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: A Project Team has been established within the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland to oversee implementation of the Act. Work is continuing in producing, in consultation with the Crown Prosecution Service, relevant training materials for staff. It is intended that such materials and subsequent training will have regard to any relevant differences in criminal law and practice between Northern Ireland and England.

Training for the Northern Ireland Departments is a matter for the Northern Ireland Administration.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what written material on the Human Rights Act 1998 has been provided to (a) the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions and (b) the Northern Ireland civil service; and if he will place copies in the Library. [103832]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland has been provided with the same material as has been issued throughout Government Departments in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Training for the Northern Ireland Departments is a matter for the Northern Ireland Administration.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements have been made to review policy and practice within departments in order to ensure full compliance with the Human Rights Act 1998; and what arrangements have been made to do this in (a) the Northern Ireland Office and (b) the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. [103834]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The Northern Ireland Office has undertaken a scrutiny of legislation which requires or may require amendment as a result of the Human Rights Act 1998. Any necessary action has already been taken or is under consideration.

The Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland continues to monitor developments in criminal law with particular reference to ECHR issues.

Saville Inquiry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was spent up to 31 December 1999 on the Saville Inquiry into the events in Londonderry on Sunday 30 January 1972. [106079]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The total cost incurred by The Bloody Sunday Inquiry up to 31 December 1999 are £13,306,797.

Young People in Care

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many places are available in secure accommodation for young people in care in Northern Ireland; [106449]

(2) how many care homes have been overcrowded in each of the last three years; [106454]

(3) how much has been spent in providing alternative places in hotels for both young people and accompanying staff in the last three years. [106448]

Mr. Mandelson: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Parades Commission

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received the review of the working of the Parades Commission; and if he will place a copy of the review in the Library. [103828]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The review of the approach to handling contentious parades is due to be completed shortly and, once we have had the opportunity to consider its findings, we will make an announcement.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

BSE

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many head de-boners went out of business as a result of the introduction of BSE safeguards; how many people lost their jobs; and how much compensation was paid by the Department. [102311]

Ms Quin: Businesses specialising in head de-boning were severely affected when tighter restrictions on cattle heads were introduced in March 1996 in line with advice from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee. The information requested on business closures and job losses is not available. No compensation was paid to head de-boners, a decision which was upheld by the European Commission on Human Rights.

Those head de-boners which also operated cutting plants were able to benefit from arrangements introduced shortly afterwards to purchase and dispose of unsaleable stocks of beef to ease the pressure on their activities.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if a credit rating was sought for each of the companies which submitted a tender in the recent award of contracts to abattoirs by the Intervention Board under the over 30-month scheme; [102360]

(2) if credit references were taken up in relation to each of the companies which submitted a tender in the recent award of contracts to abattoirs by the Intervention Board under the over 30 month scheme. [102358]

Ms Quin: The Intervention Board (IB) obtained financial reports from Dun and Bradstreet on tendering companies who were not previously contracted to provide Over Thirty Months Scheme (OTMS) slaughtering services. Decisions on the award of contracts were taken in full knowledge of the information contained in these reports. Similar reports were not sought in respect of companies with whom IB already had satisfactory and long-standing contractual relationships under the OTMS.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many visits were made to each hunt kennel in the last two years by (a) his Department's veterinary surgeons and (b) his Department's officials. [102541]

Ms Quin [holding answer 13 December 1999]: This information is not held centrally. However, the instructions issued to members of the State Veterinary Service require visits to hunt kennels to be carried out on a monthly basis to check compliance with the rules on Specified Risk Material and at least annually to check compliance with rules on non-SRM animal by-products.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice his Ministry gives to (a) hunts and (b) hunt kennels on the receipt of deadstock where (i) the dead animal is suspected of BSE and (ii) where BSE is present in the relevant herd. [102539]

Ms Quin [holding answer 13 December 1999]: All cattle suspected of having BSE are slaughtered by MAFF officials who arrange for their remains to be incinerated, apart from the heads which are sent to the Veterinary Laboratories Agency for analysis.

Deadstock which comes from herds which have had a case of BSE, but which are not BSE suspects or the offspring of BSE cases, may be sent to hunt kennels. We do not provide any special guidance on the handling of such carcases because there is no evidence of horizontal transmission of BSE. The hunt kennels are however subject to controls on specified risk material and are visited by the State Veterinary Service on a regular basis to ensure compliance. Results of their audits are published in the BSE Enforcement Bulletin, which is placed monthly on the Library of the House.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many incineration plants are currently burning (a) carcase and (b) meat and bone meal under the over 30 months scheme contract. [104241]

Ms Quin: Seven plants are currently incinerating Over Thirty Month Scheme (OTMS) carcase material from abattoirs, and 16 plants are incinerating casualty OTMS animals that have been slaughtered on-farm. One plant is currently incinerating OTMS meat and bone meal.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the (a) total number of carcases and (b) total tonnage rendered each year by each company awarded a contract under the over 30 months scheme since those contracts started. [104238]

Ms Quin: The tonnage of material processed under the Over Thirty Month Scheme (OTMS) by rendering companies contracted by the Intervention Board is given in the table.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the views of the (a) Hygiene Service and (b) Meat and Livestock Commission were formally sought on each of the companies which submitted a tender in the recent award of contracts to abattoirs by the Intervention Board under the 30 month scheme. [104160]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 20 December 1999, Official Report, column 440W.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those contracts that have been awarded by the Intervention Board for rendering or incineration under the over 30 month scheme, and the gate fees negotiated with each company. [104242]

Ms Quin: Four companies have contracts to render OTMS carcase material at an average gate fee of £80 a tonne (equivalent to approximately £40 per animal).

Prosper De Mulder Ltd.
Canterbury Mills Ltd.
Glenfarm Holdings Ltd.
William Forrest & Son (Paisley) Ltd.

Five companies have contracts to incinerate OTMS carcase material from approved abattoirs at an average gate fee of £88 per animal.

The Intervention Board has concluded contracts with three companies for the large scale incineration of meat and bone meal (MBM) produced under the OTMS. The contracts cover the incineration of a total of 650,000 tonnes of MBM at a total cost of £51.1 million, an average gate fee therefore of £79 per tonne (equivalent to approximately £10 per animal).

Shanks Chemical Services Ltd.
Fibrogen Ltd.
Prosper De Mulder Ltd.

Negotiations continue with a fourth company for the balance of the Intervention Board's incineration requirement.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate his Department has made of future incineration requirements under the over 30 months scheme. [104237]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on 15 December 1999, Official Report, column 230W.

Beef Exports

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assistance is provided by his Department for the export of English beef to the EU. [105032]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Officials have sent detailed guidance on the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES) to all abattoirs that may be eligible to participate in the Scheme and set up a helpline to give advice. The Government have also spent more than £1 million on developing the scheme, including the IT systems which are necessary to support it, which will not be recovered through charges. Close contact is maintained with the English slaughterhouse participating in DBES and a temporary rebate has been applied to charges for checking the export eligibility of animals.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department will be funding research to confirm the findings of the Scottish Office's flexible fund project RO 818 (grant number FF818) on potatoes modified for the GNA gene undertaken by the Rowett Research Institute. [101753]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 December 1999]: We have no plans to carry forward this research.

Flood Defences (South-West)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to increase funding to the Environment Agency to undertake emergency flood prevention measures in the South-West. [105417]

Mr. Morley: The Government are aware of the serious flooding that occurred over the Christmas period. We sympathise with all those affected and pay tribute to the work done by the Environment Agency and others to mitigate the effects. Apart from grants towards approved capital works, the Ministry does not contribute to the cost of the Environment Agency's flood defence work. The great majority of this work is funded by levies on local authorities, for which funding is provided through the Revenue Support Grant and Standard Spending Assessments arrangements. The cost of any emergency flood prevention measures in the South-West will need to be met through these existing mechanisms. If studies identify the need for future capital works, MAFF funding will be considered against the normal criteria and national priority assessments.

Interest Rates (Farmers)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce low-interest loans and mortgages for farmers. [105030]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Government have no plans at present to introduce low interest loans and mortgages for farmers. The £1.6 billion support for Rural Development, which my right hon. Friend announced on 7 December 1999, Official Report, columns 701–03, will be applied through project funding or grants which offer effective and well focused forms of support.

In addition, loan guarantees will continue to be available to qualifying sectors of the agriculture industry under the Government's Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those properties held by his Department and agencies responsible to him which are (a) wholly and (b) mainly unoccupied at present, giving locations and when they became so unoccupied in each case. [105305]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The information requested is set out as follows:

Deregulation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what orders his Department has made under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 in each year since 1994; and what plans it has to introduce such orders. [106084]

Ms Quin [holding answer 20 January 2000]: Since 1994 the Department has made two orders reducing regulatory burdens, The Deregulation (Corn Returns Act 1882) Order 1996 and the Deregulation (Slaughterhouses Act 1974 and Slaughter of Animals (Scotland) Act 1980) Order 1996. These Orders are estimated to have each saved industry £100,000 per year. We will continue to look for opportunities to use such orders to remove legislation where we can.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the outcome was of the Fisheries Council held in Brussels on 14 January; and if he will make a statement. [106539]

Mr. Morley: Since the Fisheries Council which met on 16–17 December succeeded in agreeing on Total Allowable Catches for 2000 there was no need for a further meeting of the Council on 14 January.

Chicken Imports

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received regarding the labelling of chicken imported into the UK from outside the European Union. [103293]

Ms Quin: Ministers and officials have received a number of letters from right hon. and hon. Members, the industry and the public on this matter. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Minister met with representatives from the National Farmers Union, the British Poultry Meat Federation and other poultry organisations on Monday 20 December to discuss this and other issues of concern to the sector.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Bonuses

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies spent in total on extra bonuses above usual payments for staff working over the New Year period; what were the (a) maximum and (b) minimum bonuses paid; how many people received the (i) maximum and (ii) minimum payments; and if he will make a statement. [104471]

Mr. Straw: I will write to the hon. Member.

Home Detention Curfew

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of prisoners who have electronic tags have not been convicted of violent crimes. [105334]

Mr. Boateng: As at 12 January 2000, 81 per cent. of those prisoners subject to home detention curfew at that time did not have a current index offence for an offence of violence. Of the total number of prisoners placed on home detention curfew since the scheme began on 28 January 1999, 83 per cent. did not have a current index offence for an offence of violence.

Puppy Farms

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department is taking to regulate intermediaries who sell on animals bred on puppy farms, with regard to certification of the animals' health. [105342]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under the Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Act 1999, which came into force on 30 December 1999, the keeper of a licensed dog breeding establishment can only lawfully sell a dog either from his or her own premises direct to a person who it is believed will not be selling it on, or to the keeper of a licensed pet shop or a Scottish rearing establishment.

A certificate of health is not required and there are no plans to introduce such a requirement into transactions, the conditions of which are essentially for the parties involved. The permitted sales outlets are, however, subject to stringent local authority licensing controls aimed at safeguarding the health and welfare of the animals involved. In addition, dogs sold through licensed pet shops/rearing establishments must wear a collar and identifying tag, to ensure that the originating breeder can be traced in all cases and not least by prospective purchasers wishing to make checks on a dog's provenance.

The Home Office has recently issued guidance to local authorities about the administration and enforcement of this legislation.

Prison Statistics

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, columns 217–18W, on prisoner statistics, if he will reformulate the table provided on Sudbury prison to show the number of prisoners serving a life sentence. [105662]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested, updated to December 1999, is given in the table.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in his projection of prison numbers for the next five years, what proportion of prisoners will be (a) female, (b) offenders in respect of cannabis, (c) class A drug offenders and (d) housed in hospital wings. [105928]

Mr. Boateng: The Research Development and Statistics Directorate of the Home Office provided revised projections of the prison population in England and Wales in October 1999. A summary of the projection is included in the October 1999 "Prison Population Brief" which is available on the Internet at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/index.htm.

Projections are provided according to various alternative scenarios. The middle variant projection assumes that Crown Court custody rates increase at 0.6 per cent. for males and 1.1 per cent. per annum for females, but sentence lengths stay at 1998 levels. A higher variant assumes that from 2001, in addition to the custody rate increase assumed in the middle variant, sentence lengths increase by 1.5 per cent. per year for males and 2 per cent. per annum for females. The results are as given in the table. These scenarios both assume that the amount of courts' business remains constant over the period. Projections take into account known legislative and policy changes.

Information on the projected number of persons committed to custody for cannabis and class A drug offences are not available. Projections are not made by type of offence.

For persons housed in hospital wings, it is estimated that over the period of the projections between 1.5 and 1.7 per cent. of the prison population will be located in health care centres at any one time.

Road Traffic Offences

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions, and how many (a) injuries and (b) deaths there were in each category of road traffic offence, in each of the last five years for which statistics are available. [105850]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is available only for those offences where death or injury are explicit in the wording of the charge and are shown in the table. Similar information for other offences is not available centrally as the circumstances of the offences are not collected.

Prosecutions for motoring offences involving death or injury, England and Wales, 1993–97

Causing death by dangerous driving	352	301	305	333	376

Causing death by aggravated vehicle taking	27	26	13	27	28
Causing bodily harm by furious driving	98	122	97	99	85

Figures for 1998 are not yet available.

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases relating to death on the road the charge was reduced from dangerous to careless driving in each of the last five years for which statistics are available. [105849]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not available centrally.

The statistics collected on court proceedings record only the offence for which the court took its final decision and not that for which the defendant was initially prosecuted, if different.

Domestic Violence

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to combat domestic violence suffered by men. [105844]

Mr. Boateng: The Government regard all forms of domestic violence as unacceptable, whether it is perpetrated by men on women, women on men or within same-sex relationships. The position of men who experience abuse is recognised in, for example, our 'Break the Chain' leaflet for domestic violence survivors and those such as family, friends and neighbours who might be able to help them. The evidence is, however, that, by comparison with men, women are more likely to experience domestic violence over a lifetime, more likely to experience repeat victimisation, more likely to be injured and to seek medical help, more likely to experience frightening threats, and more likely to be frightened and upset.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of male victims of domestic violence who are abused by their female partners. [105848]

Mr. Boateng: The most reliable figures available are from the 1996 British Crime Survey, which estimated that 650,000 men aged 16 to 59 had been assaulted by a current or former partner in 1995, of which 170,000 suffered some injury. 95 per cent. of the men assaulted had been assaulted by a female on the most recent occasion. 180,000 men said they had experienced frightening threats from a female or male partner (figures not available separately).

Police Manpower (National Insurance)

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reports he has received on the effect of changes in national insurance contributions on police staffing levels in England in 2000–01. [105891]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Association of Police Authorities estimated that the cost to the police service in England and Wales of changes in national insurance contributions could be around £23 million in 1999–2000. These additional costs were taken into account when police authorities set their budgets for 1999–2000. It is for chief constables to determine staffing levels within the overall resources available to them.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the phrase "any imposition of a similar nature", used in his answer of 8 April 1998, Official Report, column 262W, has the same meaning as in paragraph 10.5(f) of the White Paper on Interception of Communications in the United Kingdom (Cm 4368). [106059]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Yes. The intention is to provide a statutory framework to regulate the disclosure of communications data to investigating agencies. The grounds upon which disclosure of communications data may be required will be consistent with those contained in existing data protection legislation, and use of this power will be audited by an independent Commissioner, to ensure it is used only where necessary and proportionate to the matter under investigation. The new regime will also be governed by a statutory Code of Practice.

General Pinochet

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what translation facilities were available to the medical team he appointed to examine General Pinochet; and if they were available throughout the medical examination; [106010]

(2) what were the linguistic qualifications of the medical team he appointed to examine General Pinochet. [105919]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 20 January 2000]: Dr. Wyke is a native speaker of Spanish who came to this country after completing a first degree at the Autonomous National University of Mexico. Professor Lees speaks Spanish fluently to a professional standard; he makes frequent visits to Spain and other Spanish speaking countries to give university lectures, in Spanish, on his area of medical expertise.

The medical examination of Senator Pinochet was accordingly conducted in Spanish.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has held with the Government of Chile concerning the Spanish request for the extradition of General Pinochet; and if he will place correspondence relating to such discussions in the Library. [106017]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 20 January 2000]: I have not personally discussed this case, or corresponded about it, with the Government of Chile, or any of its representatives.

Some of my ministers and officials have had cause to do so. They have had strict regard to the fact that I am exercising a quasi-judicial function under the Extradition Act 1989. It is not our practice to make publicly available the contents of correspondence with other governments. The details of contacts of this nature are confidential to the governments concerned.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the terms of reference he gave the medical team he appointed to examine General Pinochet. [106007]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The medical team was asked to undertake the examinations and procedures it judged to be desirable in order to provide me with a fully comprehensive report on the state of Senator Pinochet's health.

The team was also asked, without in any way intending to limit the comprehensive scope of the commission, to advise whether there were any aspects of Senator Pinochet's state of health which, separately or together, would suggest that he is not at present fit, or is likely to become unfit, to stand trial in Spain. Particular attention was drawn to Senator Pinochet's ability to follow a line of questioning, to recall events, some of which took place as long ago as the 1970s, and to give coherent evidence.

The team was asked to advise on the extent to which the subjection of Senator Pinochet to a criminal trial would itself be likely to affect his health.

To the extent to which any of the contents of the team's report were to be influenced by observation of Senator Pinochet's conduct and manner, advice was also sought on the extent to which that conduct and manner were capable of being consciously influenced by the Senator himself.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish figures for the 12 months ending September 1998 on the (a) number of notifiable offences by police force area and by category of offence; and (b) percentages of notifiable offences in individual offence groups by police force area. [106531]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It has not been possible to estimate totals for categories of offences at the police force level for the year ending September 1998 because of the change to new Home Office counting rules for recorded crime half way through the period.

VAT (National Crime Squad and National Criminal Intelligence Service)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the amount of non-reclaimable value-added tax which will have to be paid by the (a) National Crime Squad and (b) National Criminal Intelligence Service in (i) 1999, (ii) 2000 and (iii) 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [106533]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Estimates of VAT payments by the National Crime Squad (NCS) and the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) were £4.400 million and £2.068 million respectively for 1999–2000; and £5.310 million (NCS) and £2.304 million (NCIS) for 2000–01. Out-turn for 1999–2000 is likely to be slightly lower; and estimates for 2000–01 are likely to be reduced in the light of the levies I decided for the two organisations on 10 January. There is no current estimate for the costs of VAT for the two organisations for 2001–02.

Prison Ships

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the viability of using aircraft carriers moored in Portsmouth as prison ships. [106174]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service continuously monitors the projected population figures and makes best use of the available accommodation to contain prisoners in secure custody. The Service evaluates all practical options that present themselves. Consideration has not been given to the idea of using an aircraft carrier moored in Portsmouth harbour as a prison ship.

Correspondence

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to respond to the letter of 20 December 1999 from the hon. Member for Poole on behalf of Benjamin Patrick Daniels. [106200]

Mrs. Roche: I will reply to the hon. Member for Poole shortly.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 22 November regarding a constituent. [106201]

Mrs. Roche: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 21 January. I am sorry for the delay.

Prison, Ashford

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the decision was taken to alter the plans for a 650 bed male prison at Ashford, Middlesex, to a 450 bed female prison. [106175]

Mr. Boateng: Ministerial endorsement to the construction on the Ashford site of a 450 place prison to hold female prisoners was formally given in March 1998.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to public funds of asylum seekers awaiting determination of their case in each of the last five years. [105993]

Mrs. Roche: Until 1999 (when responsibility transferred to the Home Office) asylum support costs were divided between the Department of Social Security and the Department of Health. In 1998–99, asylum support cost £470 million, of which £280 million was borne by the Department of Social Security. In 1997–98, asylum support cost £375 million, of which £305 million was borne by the Department of Social Security. In 1996–97, asylum support cost £412.7 million of which £400 million was borne by the Department of Social Security. In 1994–95 and 1995–96 asylum support costs were met by the Department of Social Security. These costs were £360 million and £420 million respectively. Changes to the Department of Social Security benefits in 1996 removed support to those asylum seekers who applied for support "in country". Support for asylum seekers was made available under the terms of the National Assistance Act 1948. With effect from 1996–97 local authorities were reimbursed for their expenditure through a special grant administered by the Department of Health.

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average waiting time for asylum seekers between arrival in the United Kingdom and determination of their case, in each of the last five years; [105994]

(2) how many asylum seekers are awaiting determination of their case; and how many were awaiting determination at the end of each of the last five years. [105992]

Mrs. Roche: As at the end of November 1999, 98,045 asylum applications were awaiting an initial decision.

Available information on outstanding applications and average waiting times for 1994 to 1998 is given in the table.

Average initial decision times in months, and number of outstanding cases, 1994–98[1]

Settlement Applications

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average waiting time for the processing of an application by a foreign national for settlement in this country on the basis of his or her marriage to a UK citizen. [105602]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is not available.

The time taken to process applications for settlement on the basis of marriage to a United Kingdom citizen is affected by a number of factors, including the complexity of individual cases. However, where the applicant obtained prior entry clearance for the purpose of marriage before entering the United Kingdom, applications for settlement are at present being dealt with within a week. Those applications where further inquiries may be needed can take considerably longer but are now being given priority. A special exercise was set in place before Christmas to target such applications.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in each of the last five years, how many applications for settlement were (a) made, (b) decided on and (c) outstanding at the year end; and what was the average time taken to process an application in each year. [106047]

Mrs. Roche: The available information relates to decisions taken on applications for indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, excluding those cases where indefinite leave to remain is refused but limited leave is granted in some capacity. Data for 1995 to the end of the first half of 1999 are given in the table, together with an estimated average time which such decisions took in 1995–98. Following reorganisation of caseworking practices at the beginning of 1999, the time taken to process applications for variation of leave, which includes applications for indefinite leave to remain, is affected by a number of factors, including the complexity of individual cases. More than half of applications for variation of leave can be processed under "fast track" procedures. Such cases are currently being determined within about a week of receipt, but applications where further inquiries are needed may take considerably longer. Streamlined procedures have, however, been introduced throughout the Integrated Casework Directorate to speed up consideration of all applications.

Entry Refusals

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons travelling by coach from Poland in the past six months have been refused entry at Dover; and what is the gender breakdown of these refusals. [104755]

Mrs. Roche: Statistics are not kept of the numbers of persons refused entry having travelled by coach, or of the gender breakdown of these refusals. A total of 1,934 Polish nationals were refused leave to enter at Dover between June and December 1999.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of passengers travelling from Poland by coach, via Dover, are interviewed by immigration officials; and of those what proportion are (a) male and (b) female. [104753]

Mrs. Roche: All Polish nationals (and other non-European Union nationals travelling from Poland) seeking leave to enter the United Kingdom are interviewed by an immigration officer. Statistics on the gender of passengers are not kept.

Correspondence

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instruct the Immigration Control Department Management Unit at the Whitgift Centre, Croydon, to reply immediately to the letter about Mrs. Sardj Goswarni of Oadby, Leicestershire, dated 23 October 1999, from the hon. and learned Member for Harborough to Moira Bing. [105982]

Mrs. Roche: An official from the Immigration and Nationality Directorate wrote to the hon. and learned member on 19 January.

Czech Republic (Visa Requirement)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his Department's letter to the hon. Member for North Thanet of 17 January (Ref. PO 20700/99), what plans he has to impose visa requirements upon visitors from the Czech Republic. [106371]

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Member is aware of the Government's concern about the numbers of asylum seekers from the Czech Republic and other parts of Central Europe. We are in close contact at ministerial and official level with the countries concerned to try to improve the position and we keep all the possible options, including a visa regime, under review.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Entrepreneurship Lessons

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many secondary school pupils in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will receive lessons in entrepreneurship in the current school year; and if he will make a statement. [101138]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not hold figures on the numbers of secondary school pupils receiving lessons in entrepreneurship. Entrepreneurship does not currently form part of the National Curriculum, and thus it is up to individual schools to decide whether, and how, to teach it.

However the revised National Curriculum—most of which will come into force from September 2000—will encourage pupils to think creatively and critically, and will encourage innovation and enterprise. The new framework for Personal, Social and Health Education (PSHE) and Citizenship will cover financial literacy, consumer education and entrepreneurial skills as follows:

At Key Stage 1, children will be taught that money comes from difference sources and can be used for different purposes.

At Key Stage 2, they will be taught to look after their money and realise that future wants and needs may be met through saving.

At Key Stage 3, they will be taught what influences how we spend or save money, and how to become competent at managing personal money.

At Key Stage 4, they will be taught to use a range of financial tools and services, including budgeting and saving, in managing personal money. They will also be taught the rights and responsibilities of consumers, employers and employees.

£7 million of Standards Fund money has been made available for next academic year for implementation of the PSHE/citizenship frameworks in schools, and £5 million has been made available for the introduction of citizenship. Further funding will be available in 2001–02. In addition the Chancellor, in his 1999 Pre-Budget Report, announced a £10 million package to boost enterprise skills in schools, particularly those in disadvantaged areas.

Life Education Centres

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make additional support available to schools to help them fund the services of life education centres; and if he will make a statement. [104009]

Jacqui Smith: The DfEE has already provided a significant amount of support for the work of Life Education Centres (LECs). Specific support has been provided for a Regional Development Officer's post, and LECs have also benefited from some the money provided by the DfEE through the Grants of Education Support and Training (GEST) and Standards Fund programmes for drug prevention and education work. We are providing a further £7.5 million of support this year and in 2000–01, through the Standards Fund, to assist all schools to deliver effective drug education. It is for individual schools to decide on the detailed content and organisation of drug education programmes in schools; Life Education Centres is one of a number of possible programmes they may adopt.

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the items in the National Assets Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 23 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104497]

Mr. Wills: The total value of money realised from the sale of assets by the Department from 23 February 1999 to January 2000, its agencies, and associated public bodies since the publication of the information in the National Assets Register is £8,407,482.

Asset management is kept under close review, and those which are surplus to requirements are disposed of as quickly as possible, subject to value for money considerations. They are normally disposed of on the open market by public auction or tender. The exception to this rule is that in DfEE, good working IT equipment is gifted to education and employment bodies and projects via third party organisations. The table lists items reported as sold by the Department, its agencies, and associated public bodies since the information on assets was published in the National Assets Register.

[1] Other IT Equipment—Other than the items sold by public auction and the recycling project, approx. 676 IT items were "scrapped" as they had no open market value.

[2] Letchworth Skill Centre—this property was disposed of in October 1998. The cash for this sale is payable in instalments spanning several years. The value realised represents the money received by the Department from this sale since last reported. There remain two instalments to be collected totalling £850,000 (£500,000 due in April 2000 and £350,000 due April 2001).

Reception Classes

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will review incentives for schools to recruit children early into reception classes. [105356]

Ms Hodge: The Secretary of State will continue to encourage school admission authorities to review with Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships the needs of four-year-old children and the preferences of their parents. This is stated in the recently published report "Tomorrow's Children: the review of pre-schools and playgroups and the Government's response."

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list local authorities which maintain (a) a single point of entry and (b) two points of entry to reception classes. [105355]

Ms Hodge: The Department is unable to compile a list of local education authorities who operate a single and two point of entry to infant and primary school reception classes. The timing of admission to reception classes may vary from school to school because in some cases responsibility for admission arrangements rest with the individual schools' governing bodies.

Student Loans

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what ethical guidelines were set for Hays Document Management before the Student Loan contract was placed in Calcutta and Columbo. [105505]

Mr. Wicks: This is a matter for the Student Loans Company and I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member with the information requested and place a copy of the reply in the Library.

Schools Adjudicators

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will take steps to ensure that school closure adjudicators who have served as local councillors are not appointed to carry out adjudications into closure proposals put forward by local authorities controlled by the political party to which they belong. [105627]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 18 January 2000]: The Chief Adjudicator, Sir Peter Newsam, is responsible for allocating school closure proposals to Adjudicators. In doing so he takes into consideration possible conflicts of interest.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements have been made to enable the adjudicator he has appointed to consider Northumberland County Council's proposals to close Kirknewton, Acklington and Milfield schools, to hold a public hearing or inquiry into the proposals, in accordance with the guidance on the School Adjudication System which he issued on 1 April 1999. [105641]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 18 January 2000]: I understand that Dr. Billings, the Adjudicator appointed to consider Northumberland County Council's proposals, is planning to hear directly from parents and other interested parties who have anything to add to the points made during the consultations which have already taken place. He has instructed the Office of the Schools Adjudicator to make the necessary arrangements.

Subsidised Recycled Computers Scheme

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will provide funding to low-income earners and families participating in the subsidised recycled computers scheme to cover the costs of (a) telephone lines and calls, (b) increased electricity usage, (c) paper for printing and (d) maintenance and servicing. [105836]

Mr. Wills: The £15 million made available for the 'Computers Within Reach' initiative is entirely focused on maximising the subsidy on the recycling process, to enable computers to be made available at the lowest personal cost to those who could not otherwise afford it. The Department recognises that recipients' needs, circumstances and priorities will change during the lifetime of the scheme—for example, a job-seeker may initially wish to work off-line to produce a CV and develop word-processing, database and spreadsheet skills in order to improve employability. In order to meet this range of need, the computers will all be of a high minimum specification, including 56k modem, enabling recipients to control costs in using them on or off-line as they prefer. As usage will vary, subsidised funding will not be made available to cover telephone lines or calls. Electricity and paper costs are likely to be minimal, and the cost of the bureaucracy to administer them would not represent value for money.

Maintenance and support are an essential part of this initiative. The minimum level of support available to all users under the scheme is as follows:

Maintenance and Support
Delivery and installation	Delivery and installation to the purchaser's home or preferred location. Installation must include connection to the internet if required, receipt of a welcome e-mail and access to the NGfL home page

Maintenance and Support
Service	Maintenance for a minimum of one year for all hardware purchased.
Warranty	Replacement of system with equivalent or better specification in the event of failure within one year.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the procedure which must be followed by local education authorities before closing special needs schools; who makes the final decision in such instances; and if he will make a statement. [105577]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 19 January 2000]: A local education authority wishing to close a special school must first consult all interested parties, including the school itself, parents who have children at the school and any other local education authorities placing children at the school. If, after consultation, the local education authority decide to proceed with closure they must publish notices advising of their intention and providing information about alternative provision to be made for pupils who would be displaced by the closure. The notice must also be sent to whomever will be deciding the proposals. Usually, this will be the local School Organisation Committee; exceptionally, where a local School Organisation Plan has not been agreed, the decision will fall to the Secretary of State.

Following publication of a proposal there is a statutory period during which anyone can send objections to the proposal to the local education authority. The authority then have a further statutory period in which to send their comments on the objections to the School Organisation Committee (or the Secretary of State).

The School Organisation Committee's decision on statutory proposals, or that of the Secretary of State, is final. However, in cases where the School Organisation Committee cannot reach a unanimous view, the proposal must be referred to an independent adjudicator for decision.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students with special educational needs receive an assessment and have a plan prepared for their transition from school to further education, as a proportion of those so entitled; and what action he is taking to ensure that local authorities carry out their statutory obligations in this area. [106033]

Jacqui Smith: This information is not collected centrally. We would however expect LEAs and schools to have regard to their statutory duty to carry out a transitional review of a young person's statement of special educational needs following his or her 14th birthday; and to produce a transition plan covering all aspects of the young person's future development. The evidence is that LEAs and schools are meeting their obligations in this area. My Department is however ready to investigate any cases brought to its attention in which a school or LEA is not so complying.

Autism

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the findings of the 1998–99 annual report of the Special Educational Needs Tribunal on cases involving autism. [105914]

Jacqui Smith: The number of appeals registered with the Special Educational Needs Tribunal in 1998–99 was 2,412. Of these, 313 involved autism.

The Special Educational Needs Tribunal operates independently of Government and it would not be appropriate for the Department to comment on the cases heard.

In September 1999 I hosted an Autism in Education Seminar, which has led to the establishment of a working group tasked to identify and disseminate good practice in relation to educational provision for children with autism.

Employment Action Zones

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many contracts for employment action zones have been awarded to bids led by the public and voluntary sectors. [103689]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 20 January 2000]: We have not yet awarded any contracts to run Employment Zones from April 2000. We have, however, identified preferred bidders in 11 areas. Of these, seven will be led by a public sector/private sector consortium. The other four will be private sector led and we were encouraged that in each case the private sector organisation concerned is working in partnership with other public and/or voluntary organisations.

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for each year between 1990 and the latest year for which figures are available, what were the number of (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds in full-time education as a percentage of the age group, in total and broken down by gender. [106405]

Mr. Wicks: The information requested is contained in the following table:

Higher Education Access Funds

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he intends to publish the report of his study into higher education access funds. [106203]

Mr. Wicks: We will publish the report of the Hardship Loans and Access Funds Review shortly.

Youth Employment (Shropshire)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the (a) percentage and (b) total reduction in youth unemployment have been since 1 May 1997 in (i) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (ii) Shropshire; and if he will make a statement. [105526]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Paul Marsden, dated 24 January 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the percentage and reduction in youth unemployment since 1st May 1997 in Shrewsbury and Atcham, and Shropshire.

The ONS publish a monthly count of claimants of unemployment-related benefits. The claimant count consists of all people claiming Jobseeker's Allowance or National Insurance credits at Employment Service local offices. They must declare that they are out of work, capable of, available for and actively seeking work during the week in which the claim is made.

Between 1st May[1] and November 1999 unadjusted computerised claimants amongst 18–24 years old fell by 143 (37%) in the Shrewsbury and Atcham constituency and 695 (36%) in the Shropshire county.

[1] The closest count date for the 1st May relates to April's data.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Age Discrimination

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to implement Article 13 of the Treaty of Amsterdam with regard to age discrimination. [105596]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

At this stage the Commission published its proposal for a framework directive dealing with discrimination in employment and training on the grounds of disability, age, ethnic origin, religion/belief and sexual orientation, which was put forward by the European Commission in November. Negotiations have just begun within the relevant Working Group of the Social Affairs Council and agreement will require unanimity.

The Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment is the centrepiece of our strategy to combat age discrimination in the workplace. The Code, which is non-statutory, sets the standard for non-ageist approaches to recruitment, training and development, promotion, redundancy and retirement. This is backed by detailed guidance and case studies. The Code, launched in June 1999, was developed with the help and advice of some key social partners, including the TUC, CBI, Institute of Personnel and Development, Age Concern and the Employers Forum on Age, among others. To date over 40,000 copies have been issued.

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many jobs in (a) the Foreign Office and (b) EU institutions have an age limitation. [105595]

Mr. Vaz: All the jobs in the Diplomatic Service and the Home Civil Service of the Foreign Office have a retirement age of 60. For recruitment to the Diplomatic Service there is a lower age limit of 21 and an upper age limit of 52. For the Home Civil Service there is a lower age limit of 16 and an upper age limit of 58.

The upper age limit for recruitment to the EU institutions is 45. The age of retirement is 65.

Europe Roadshow

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the reasoning behind the selection of each venue for the Your Britain Your Europe roadshow. [105536]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to my written reply to his question of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 415W. He should make a point of reading the replies to questions he has tabled.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he held with hon. Members regarding the Your Britain Your Europe roadshow, prior to its tour. [105537]

Mr. Vaz: Prior to the roadshow I wrote to all the hon. Members whose constituencies I covered during my tour.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason Her Majesty's Government have sponsored the Your Britain Your Europe roadshow; which organisations were consulted over planning; and if he will make a statement on efforts made to maintain political neutrality therein. [105538]

Mr. Vaz: It is Government policy to set out the benefits of our membership of the EU. One of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's publicly declared performance targets is to increase public support for EU activities.

We consulted the European Commission, European Parliament, Britain in Europe and Government Departments during the planning stage.

This was not a party political event. All relevant constituency MPs and MEPs were invited to join.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the nature of the activities featuring in the Your Britain Your Europe roadshow as concern (a) the British Embassy in Paris, (b) schools, (c) Nissan, Sunderland, (d) the House of Commons and (e) the South West Regional Euro Forum; and if he will deposit a copy of all material distributed during the tour in the Library. [105535]

Mr. Vaz: At the British Embassy in Paris I conducted a radio interview for the Today programme. In the UK, I visited several schools either to discuss EU projects in which they were involved, or to exchange views on Europe with students. At Nissan I met plant management and senior business leaders to discuss the impact of the single market on their businesses. I had no roadshow engagement in the House of Commons. At the South West Regional Euro Forum, I met regional business leaders to discuss trade opportunities and the impact of the euro. I have deposited copies of the roadshow material in the House of Commons Library.

Cologne Presidency Conclusions

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the non-military crisis response tools referred to in Section 56 of the Cologne Presidency Conclusions. [105588]

Mr. Vaz: The Conclusions of the Cologne European Council called on the General Affairs Council to deal with all aspects of security with a view to enhancing and better co-ordinating the Union's and member states' crisis response tools. In pursuit of this remit, the Presidency report adopted by the Helsinki European Council on "Non-military crisis management of the European Union" outlined further action on non-military aspects of security. It does not define the scope of that activity, but includes an illustrative list covering civilian police, humanitarian assistance, administrative and legal rehabilitation, search and rescue, electoral and human rights monitoring.

EMU

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will deposit in the Library a copy of the Wilton Park paper entitled Europe after Economic and Monetary Union; and if he will make a statement on his Department's assessment of political conclusions reached. [105587]

Mr. Vaz: There is no Wilton Park paper with that exact title. However two papers on the subject of EMU, summarising conferences held in October 1998 and May 1999, are available on Wilton Park website www.wiltonpark.org.uk.

Wilton Park brings together people of all viewpoints to discuss topical issues. Although its finances are underwritten by my Department, its academic independence is guaranteed. Its reports on EMU as on other subjects reflect the personal accounts of the chairman and rapporteur of the range of views expressed at its conferences. Government policy on EMU is clear. The determining factor underpinning any Government decision on EMU membership is whether the economic benefits from joining are clear and unambiguous.

International Federation of Europe Houses

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the mission statement of the International Federation of Europe Houses; and if he will deposit in the library a list of (a) these Houses and (b) the activities of the Houses funded by the EU in 1999. [105790]

Mr. Vaz: The aim of the International Federation of Europe Houses is to encourage debate among the citizens of Europe about the issue of European integration. The members of the Federation are independent bodies with structures and operating procedures which reflect the particular community, region, country and cultural sphere in which they operate.

A list of the Houses and the activities of the Houses in 1999 has been deposited in the Library.

The European Commission provides up to a maximum of 50 per cent. funding for individual projects.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105801]

Mr. Hain: We have in place a Health Promotion Strategy, based on the White Paper "Our Healthier Nation", and have signed up to the Healthy Workplace Initiative. The strategy includes a policy limiting smoking to designated areas and single occupancy offices. In response to the request by the Government White Paper "Smoking Kills", further restrictions to the smoking policy are under consideration.

We run a campaign on National No Smoking Day and also incorporate anti-smoking initiatives in regular health fairs. Advice on quitting smoking forms part of routine medical clearance procedures for employees (and spouses) going overseas and our doctors and nurses provide one-to-one and group support for individuals who want to quit smoking. Our health and safety team raise awareness about smoking on seminars for senior managers and on pre-posting training courses and we offer a range of information through our Healthline Library. Plans are in hand for a website which will be used to promote various health issues including anti-smoking initiatives.

Golden Fleece

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Argentine Government regarding access by the Stanley-registered schooner Golden Fleece to the port of Ushuaia; and if he will make a statement. [106077]

Mr. Battle: We are aware of the paper which the owner of the Golden Fleece recently received from the port authorities in Ushuaia about entry by his vessel to Argentine ports. We have taken this incident up with the Argentine Government in Buenos Aires. I understand that these discussions are progressing satisfactorily. I hope that the matter can be resolved in a way that will not result in a recurrence of this type of incident. I shall write to my hon. Friend to update him on the outcome of our representations.

Corpus Juris

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the basis of his statement that corpus juris was no longer on the agenda. [106400]

Mr. Vaz: The idea of a European Public Prosecutor was discussed but not agreed at Tampere. The Corpus Juris package of proposals have never been formally tabled and were not subject to discussion.

Xenophobia

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the role of the EU Monitoring Centre on Xenophobia in formulating the Charter of Fundamental Rights. [106375]

Mr. Vaz: It is open to individuals and organisations such as the EU Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia to contribute views on the Charter. The Charter drafting body consists only of representatives of member states, National Parliaments, the European Parliament and the Commission.

Arms Exports

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions exports notified as having been denied under the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports have been subsequently taken up by businesses from (i) other EU countries and (ii) non-EU countries. [106309]

Mr. Hain: Operative Provision 3 of the EU Code of Conduct sets out the procedures to be followed by member states refusing licence applications and consulting other states about their notification of denial of a licence.

Operative Provision 4 of the EU Code of Conduct states that

> "Member States will keep such denials and consultations confidential and will not use them for commercial advantage".

These provisions effectively prevent member states from revealing business gained as a result of undercuts following EU Denials. We are not informed if non-EU countries take up business refused by EU member states.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of his Department on the control of arms exports to combatants in the Great Lakes Region. [106385]

Mr. Hain: Export licence applications for countries involved in the conflict in the Great Lakes region are considered on a case by case basis against our strict national criteria and those in the EU Code of Conduct.

Nuclear Deterrent

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the oral statement made by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on 18 January 2000, Official Report, columns 171–74WH, if it remains Her Majesty's Government's policy to retain a strategic nuclear deterrent as long as other countries possess nuclear weapons. [106132]

Mr. Vaz: We pledged in our election manifesto to retain Trident as the ultimate guarantee of the United Kingdom's security while pressing for multilateral negotiations towards mutual, balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons.

When we are satisfied with progress towards our goal of the global elimination of nuclear weapons, we will ensure that British nuclear weapons are included in negotiations.

Pakistan

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken since 12 October 1999 to seek a European Union embargo on the export of arms and dual-use goods to Pakistan. [106647]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the coup in Pakistan with his EU colleagues at the European Council at Tampere on 15–16 October 1999 and at the General Affairs Council on 15 October 1999. EU Foreign Ministers considered a full range of options for further measures against the military regime.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the minutes of the meeting on 8 December 1999 between officials of his Department and other departments at which the processing of strategic export licence applications for Pakistan was discussed. [106646]

Mr. Hain: Minutes of internal discussions are not made public under Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Kosovo

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the export of a load handling system and container unit to Norwegian People's Aid in Kosovo. [106867]

Mr. Vaz: We have granted a licence for the export to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) of a Load Handling System and Container Unit for use by Norwegian People's Aid, an organisation engaged in humanitarian demining activities in Kosovo on behalf of the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK). These goods are on the UK's Military List.

UN Security Council resolution (UNSCR) 1160 imposed an arms embargo on the FRY. The only exception to this embargo is that in UNSCR 1244, which provides that prohibitions imposed by UNSCR 1160 shall not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related material for use by the international civil and security presence in Kosovo. We have notified the UN Sanctions Committee of this export and they have raised no objection. The export of the equipment required for demining purposes is not prohibited by the EU arms embargo.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the accommodation available for displaced and homeless Roma in Kosovo. [106098]

Mr. Vaz: UNMIK have given urgent consideration to the needs of the Roma. Shelter for all of Kosovo's population has been a major concern for the international community working in Kosovo this winter.

A number of contingency measures have been taken to provide some form of protection for people who do not have access to shelter of their own. These include:

500 prefabricated units set up in the Mitrovica, Pec and Decane districts;

8,000 places in heated collective accommodation identified; the provision of up to 15,000 all-season tents and heating.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105870]

Mr. Hain: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for the Treasury, Official Report, columns 117–8W.

EU Common Defence and Security Policy

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of European Union enlargement on the Common European Defence and Security Policy. [104537]

Mr. Vaz: The development of the CEDSP of the EU continues following the conclusions of the Helsinki European Council. The arrangements put in place need to reflect, before enlargement, the EU's relations with the aspirant countries and equally to enable the policy to function in an enlarged community. For their part, new members will be expected to accept the defence acquis of the Union when they join.

World Trade Organisation (Croatian Membership)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on Croatia's application for membership of the World Trade Organisation. [104756]

Mr. Vaz: We support Croatia's application to join the World Trade Organisation. Membership will allow Croatia to enjoy the benefits of integration in the world trading system. We hope that agreement on the terms of Croatia's joining can be reached quickly.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact that the deferment of Croatia's application to join the World Trade Organisation will have on its advancement (a) to a full market economy and (b) to meet criteria for European Union membership; and if he will make a statement. [104757]

Mr. Vaz: We hope that the agreement on the terms of Croatia's joining the WTO can be reached quickly, but a delay need not affect Croatia's progress towards a full market economy or EU membership. Croatia can reform its economic and market structures independently of pursuing its application to join the WTO. We urge the new Croatian government to make progress towards meeting the criteria for EU membership, including democratisation, respect for human rights and compliance with international obligations.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will discuss Croatia's application for membership of the World Trade Organisation when he next meets (a) the United States Secretary of State, (b) the Foreign Minister of France and (c) the European Commission; and if he will make a statement. [104752]

Mr. Vaz: The GAC on 24 January will discuss the full range of EU policy towards Croatia in light of the election results. We support Croatia's accession to the World Trade Organisation (WTO). The Balkans are likely to be on the agenda when the Foreign Secretary next speaks to Mrs. Albright.

Visa Regimes (Europe)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs with which European countries the United Kingdom operates a visa regime. [104754]

Mr. Vaz: The United Kingdom operates a visa regime on the following European countries:

Albania
Belarus
Bosnia Herzegovina
Bulgaria
Croatia
Macedonia
Romania
Slovakia
Turkey
Ukraine
Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

East Timor

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current security situation in East Timor. [104565]

Mr. Battle: I visited Indonesia and East Timor on 16–20 January. As I discussed with Major General Cosgrove, the Commander of INTERFET, the security situation in East Timor is generally stable. A memorandum of understanding between the Indonesian Armed Forces, the International Force in East Timor (INTERFET) and the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) on relations at the East Timor/West Timor border was signed on 12 January. All remain concerned about militia activity in the enclave of Oecussi and in West Timor's refugee camps. I made our concerns about this clear to the Indonesian Regional Military Commander during my visit.

Commercial Guidelines

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidelines his Department gives to British private sector companies which employ non-governmental military companies in areas of conflict in the developing world. [106128]

Mr. Battle: No specific prescriptive guidelines exist.

Both the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office encourage British private sector companies to act responsibly in overseas investments, particularly in areas of conflict.

Both Departments provide briefing on the prevailing internal situation in specific countries on request.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

World Trade Organisation

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to co-ordinate different Government department's policies towards the World Trade Organisation. [104503]

Mr. Caborn: We use informal and formal networks into which we put a lot of effort. Informally, DTI officials have almost daily contact with colleagues in other Government Departments, including in particular FCO, HMT, DfID, MAFF and DETR. More formally, we have regular cross-Whitehall meetings of officials in a Trade Policy Group. There is also correspondence at ministerial level and discussions in Cabinet Committee. Reflecting this close co-ordination we had a team of officials including other Government Departments in Seattle and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was accompanied by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for State for International Development, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and myself.

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will initiate a consultation process concerning the outcome of the World Trade Organisation talks in Seattle and future policy in relation to such talks. [105061]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State stated the Government's position following the Seattle Conference in the debate in the House on 9 December 1999, Official Report, columns 1022–94. As the Government remain committed to the launch of a new comprehensive Round of trade negotiations, the existing consultation processes which they have in place remain valid. This includes consultation with Parliament, to which the Government attach particular importance. The Government launched a wider consultation exercise last year, including a new website which we will be expanding in the coming months to provide more information and features, and to which we have had a good response. We will also continue to hold meetings with a range of people including business, NGOs and trades unions at both official and ministerial level.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance he is intending to provide to developing countries without a permanent representative to the World Trade Organisation Secretariat in Geneva in order to assist them to be more fully involved in the Millennium Round of trade negotiations. [105579]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 20 January 2000]: While the Government regret that a new Round was not launched at the Seattle Conference at the end of last year, we remain committed to launching a comprehensive Round at the earliest opportunity. The Government have committed themselves to increasing the WTO's regular budget for technical assistance. In addition, the Government have funded a number of other programmes for countries without a mission in Geneva including: a week-long series of briefings, seminars and policy debates in Geneva to help these countries prepare for the Seattle meeting; support for CARICOM countries most of whom do not have a representative in Geneva to participate in WTO negotiations; their contribution to the Commonwealth's Trade and Investment Access Facility through which they are funding inter alia a Geneva-based trade policy expert to advise their trade Ministries. In addition, the Government are working with a wide range of organisations including UNCTAD, the World Bank and Commonwealth Secretariat to help build the trade capacity of developing and least developed countries so that they can participate more effectively in the world trading system.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason Croatia's application for membership of the World Trade Organisation was not accepted; and if he will make a statement. [104758]

Mr. Caborn: Croatia's market access offer in services which forms part of her World Trade Organisation (WTO) accession negotiations has not been accepted by all WTO members. This currently prevents her becoming a member of the WTO. The United Kingdom continues to fully support Croatian WTO accession, and looks forward to welcoming her as a WTO member in the near future.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to liaise with the Secretary of State for Social Security to ensure that the introduction of stakeholder pension schemes are introduced in a way which minimises the regulatory impact and cost of compliance for small businesses. [105599]

Ms Hewitt: As a result of the consultation process, one of the key decisions on stakeholder pensions announced by the Secretary of State for Social Security on 10 January 2000, Official Report, columns 79–80W was that businesses with fewer than five employees will not be required to provide access to a scheme, thus minimising the additional burden for small businesses. My officials in the Small Business Service are in continuing discussions with their counterparts in the Department for Social Security, and with representative bodies, specifically on how the potential administrative burden on employers can be kept to a minimum.

Company Assistance (Non-assisted Areas)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (1) financial assistance is available to new businesses in non-assisted areas; [105274]

(2) what financial assistance he will provide for company expansion in non-assisted areas. [105273]

Mr. Caborn: Financial Assistance to companies in non-Assisted Areas is restricted to SMEs. The Secretary of State announced on 10 November 1999, Official Report, column 629W, proposals for a new Enterprise Grant scheme for SMEs which will be available in certain specified non-Assisted Areas, as well as the Assisted Areas. This is a discretionary scheme offering a grant of up to 15 per cent. of fixed capital costs on projects of less than £500,000 (7½ per cent. in the case of medium sized firms in the specified non-Assisted Areas), with a maximum grant of £75,000. Both new businesses and existing companies seeking to expand are eligible to apply. Further details of the scheme can be found in the scheme brochure, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. In addition, the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme continues to support small firms nationally by providing a Government Guarantee, against default by borrowers, to high street banks and other financial bodies. Loans under the Scheme can be between £5,000 and £250,000 to both new and existing businesses which are looking to expand.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list for each member of the ECGD Advisory Committee how much ECGD business has been undertaken in respect of which the member has a declared financial interest. [105419]

Mr. Caborn: The amount of business for which ECGD has provided cover for companies or banks in which EGAC members have declared a financial interest is as follows:

Member	Date of entry	Company in which interest held	Business since date of entry £ million
David Harrison	January 1997	Lloyds TSB plc	[1]281

[1] The figures are for finance provided by the banks either as sole lender or member of a lending syndicate (principal amounts only).

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which countries are off cover for medium/long-term ECGD export credit cover. [105478]

Mr. Caborn: The table shows, from information readily available, those markets where there is no medium/long-term cover available.

The table also includes those markets where only projects meeting the "Good Projects" criteria will be considered. Where no medium-term cover is available ECGD may consider viable hard currency earning projects in the public/private sector (not sovereign) on a case-by-case basis.

EU Structural Funds

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has given on the retrospective funding of projects under the forthcoming Objective 1 Programme. [105523]

Mr. Caborn: The Structural Funds General Regulation sets out when retrospective funding of projects is permitted. For the UK's Objective 1 programmes this is the date on which the Commission deem they had received an acceptable draft of the programme. For the Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly programme, this is 3 November 1999.

It has always been a matter for Programme Monitoring Committees to decide whether, and to what extent, they wish to use any retrospection.

Enterprise Grant

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce (a) the criteria for the tier 3 grant up to £75,000 and (b) the amount available to the regions of England; and if he will make a statement. [106152]

Mr. Caborn: The information is as follows:

(a) My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 10 November 1999, Official Report, column 629W, a new discretionary Enterprise Grant scheme which would be available to SMEs in tier 3 and the Assisted Areas of the English regions. The aim is to target high quality projects with fixed capital investment of up to £500,000. There will be some regional variation in the delivery of the scheme through the Government Offices, taking account of the economic strategies of the Regional Development Agencies. Further details of the scheme's core criteria can be found in the scheme brochure, copies of which I have placed in the Libraries of the Houses.

(b) The budget for Enterprise Grant is £45 million over three years. The allocation for 2000–01 by region, based on 3-year average spending on Regional Selective Assistance cases at this level, will be as follows:

Region	Allocation for 2000–01
East	300
East Midlands	1,200
London	300
North East	3,000
North West	3,600
South East	900
South West	450
West Midlands	3,150
Yorkshire and Humberside	2,100
Total	15,000

National Minimum Wage

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will quantify the impact of a minimum wage increase to (a) £4, (b) £4.50 and (c) £5 per hour on (i) employment, (ii) price levels and (iii) Government expenditure. [105916]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Measuring the effect of hypothetical levels of the national minimum wage on employment, price levels and Government expenditure is a highly complex task and the impacts would be difficult to quantify. For the last nine months the Low Pay Commission has carried out a thorough empirical study of the impact of the actual minimum wage since its introduction, and that report will be published soon. Neither the Government nor the Low Pay Commission has carried out detailed modelling on the scenarios given in the question, and could not do so except at a disproportionate cost.

Post Offices

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices and sub-post offices there were in England in May 1997, 1998 and 1999; and what the projected figure is for 2000. [106042]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office the numbers of directly operated post offices and of sub-post offices in England were as follows:

	Directly operated	Sub-post offices	Total
March 1998	510	14,268	14,778
March 1999	502	14,091	14,593

The Post Office does not have the comparable figures for years before 1998 and does not make forward projections of post office numbers.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices there were in the Salisbury constituency in each year from 1983 to 1999; and if he will make a statement. [106157]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that they do not hold historic information on the numbers of post offices in each parliamentary constituency and that such information cannot readily be compiled.

The Post Office advise that in October 1999 the number of post offices in the Salisbury constituency was 55.

Benefit Payment Methods

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact that switching payments from benefits and pensions books to bank transfers will have on local post offices and sub-post offices. [106076]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The automation of the post office network, which is due for completion by the spring of 2001, will enable the Post Office to extend its arrangements with the high street banks to offer a range of banking facilities at post offices. This will mean that benefit recipients who wish to access their benefits in cash at post offices will continue to be able to do so, both before and after the migration of benefit payments to automated credit transfer from 2003, while other bank customers will benefit from the wider availability of banking facilities, particularly in rural areas.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make available all information relating to the proportion of business income accounted for by Benefits Agency business for post offices within (a) Somerset and (b) the Yeovil constituency; and if he will make a statement. [104749]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The proportion of business income accounted for by Benefits Agency business for post offices varies from post office to post office.

"The Rising Tide"

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the extent to which the objectives set out in the report of the Committee on Women in Science and Technology, The Rising Tide, have been met. [106051]

Ms Hewitt: The Department's Unit charged with promoting science, engineering and technology (SET) for women, which was set up in response to one of "The Rising Tide" recommendations, continues to monitor progress on the other recommendations in that report.

There is a continuing problem with the under-representation of women in SET, especially in the physical sciences and engineering, and the Unit works with other organisations in the field to seek to redress this. Recent initiatives include the ATHENA project, a joint project with the Higher Education Funding Councils and the Committee of Vice Chancellors and Principals, targeted at addressing barriers to progression in higher education, and promoting a positive image for women in SET careers through the recent poster campaign targeted at 13-year-old girls. Further information and links to other relevant organisations are available via the Unit's website at www.set4women.gov.uk.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much debt service he estimates will be received from each of the heavily-indebted poor countries in the financial years (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01. [105745]

Mr. Caborn: The UK has debt agreements with 32 heavily indebted poor countries (HIPCs). The table shows payments due to ECGD under these agreements together with an estimate of amounts likely to be received by the end of each year, assuming the schedules remain unchanged. However a number of these HIPCs will benefit from further debt reduction and rescheduling in the current year under the enhanced HIPC Initiative. This provides for up to 90 per cent. debt reduction multilaterally, or more in the case of need. Additionally some will benefit from the Chancellor's recent announcement that the UK will unilaterally write off 100 per cent. of the debt in certain circumstances. The extent of further debt reduction and the timing thereof for each country depends on a number of factors. Consequently it is not yet possible to gauge with any accuracy the effect on the current estimates.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much total bilateral debt service was received by Her Majesty's Government from each of the heavily-indebted poor countries in the financial year 1998–99. [105738]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 20 January 2000]: In the financial year 1998–99 a total of £39.628 million was received from heavily-indebted poor countries under bilateral debt agreements. The table shows a country by country breakdown.

Information Technology

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to ensure the continued growth of the IT and communications infrastructure. [106090]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 20 January 2000]: We will continue to work with Oftel and the European Commission to ensure that the regulatory framework promotes competition and investment in communications infrastructure and services. This year will see the grant of licences for third generation mobile and broadband fixed wireless services which will give a major boost to competition in broadband services. BT is also investing heavily in upgrading its local loop so that competing service providers can provide new broadband services from this Spring. Competing telecoms operators will also be able to provide such services over unbundled local loop from July 2001.

Companies (Political Fundraising)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will seek to reform company law to control the use of companies for fundraising for extremist purposes; [106096]

(2) if he will investigate possible breaches of company law by Info 2000 Software Ltd; and if he will make a statement; [106094]

(3) if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a limited company may be used for fundraising for extremist causes; [106093]

(4) if he will seek to amend company law to enable those dealing with companies whose function is fundraising for extremist causes to be aware of the nature of the company with which they are dealing. [106095]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 20 January 2000]: In many cases a company's memorandum of association, delivered for the purposes of incorporation, will disclose the nature of its objects. However this is not a statutory requirement and a company's objects are often drafted in general terms and do not in practice restrain the company's activities. In subsequent disclosure on its annual return, a company is required either to give its Standard Industrial Classification code, which indicates its main activities, or to give a verbal description of them. Those companies that are obliged to file a directors' report as part of their annual accounts must include a description of their main activities in that report. All these documents are available for public inspection.

At present, the law requires that companies disclose in the directors' report all donations or subscriptions in excess of £200 to a political party of the United Kingdom. The Political Parties Elections and Referendums Bill, now before the House, will seek to widen the scope of this disclosure requirement by extending it to include all foreign political parties.

If a company and/or those connected with it, are engaged in any criminal activity, they will be subject to the appropriate criminal sanctions. If a company fails to file its annual report or accounts, this can lead to the company being struck off. In relation to the specific company referred to in my hon. Friend's questions, it is currently in default of its filing obligations, and steps are being taken to strike the company off. If the hon. Member has any further specific information it should be sent to my Department, for consideration of what further action, if any, should be taken.

Ethical Trading Initiative

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial support his Department has given to the Ethical Trading Initiative; and if he will make a statement. [106126]

Mr. Caborn: My Department, together with the Department for International Development and other interested departments, fully supports the aims of the Ethical Trading Initiative and encourages companies to associate themselves with it. It is an important voluntary sector initiative promoting corporate codes of conduct relating to companies' dealings with overseas suppliers. My Department does not provide direct financial support to the Ethical Trading Initiative, although such assistance is provided by the Department for International Development.

Internet

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the amount of telephone traffic going via the internet; and if he will make a statement. [106718]

Ms Hewitt: Current estimates are that no more than 1 per cent. of voice telephony traffic globally is carried over the internet. But an increasing proportion of all telecommunications traffic consists of internet data. According to OFTEL, the UK Telecommunications regulator, the current proportion in the UK is around 25 per cent. of all telecommunications traffic.

Defence-related Exports

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the total sum paid out in claims authorised by the Export Credits Guarantee Department in 1998–99 was for defence-related exports. [105929]

Mr. Caborn: 21 per cent. of the claims authorised in 1998–99 were in respect of defence-related exports.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the Export Credits Guarantee Department's 1998–99 exposure in unrecovered claims is for defence-related exports. [105931]

Mr. Caborn: 8.5 per cent. of unrecovered claims were in respect of defence-related exports.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the Government's policy is concerning the underwriting of defence-related equipment sales to the Governments of (a) Jordan, (b) Kenya, (c) Egypt, (d) Algeria and (e) Nigeria. [105933]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD, for varying reasons, is not currently underwriting defence-related equipment sales to the Governments of Jordan, Kenya and Algeria. It is unlikely that ECGD support would be available for defence sales to Nigeria. In principle, cover is available for defence sales to Egypt on a case by case basis.

With the exception of Egypt, ECGD has not supported defence business on these markets for some years.

It is a condition of ECGD support for defence business that there should be a valid export licence, if applicable, for the goods involved.

Parental Leave

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimates he has made of the rate of take-up of parental leave if it were (a) paid by employers, (b) paid by the Government and (c) unpaid. [106032]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In the Regulatory Impact Assessment we produced an estimate that for every 700,000 babies born, 100,000 parents will take unpaid parental leave. We have not produced estimates on the rate of take-up of paid parental leave.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the potential costs of parental leave if it were paid by the Government. [106031]

Mr. Alan Johnson: We have introduced unpaid parental leave as agreed by the European Social Partners and in line with our commitment in the Fairness at Work White Paper. The Regulatory Impact Assessment makes an estimate of the cost of unpaid parental leave. We have not produced an estimate of the potential costs of paid parental leave.

European Employment Pact

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 6 December, Official Report, column 420W, on the Employment Pact, if it is her Department's assessment that a quantitative evaluation is possible of the practical benefits arising from the European Employment Pact. [105659]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The European Employment Pact brought together three processes: the Luxembourg employment process, the Cardiff economic reform process and the new Cologne macro-economic dialogue. It brings fresh impetus to the promotion of long term, sustainable job creation in a climate of stability and growth. The Joint Employment Report assesses progress against the Employment Guidelines and the Cardiff Reports assess the progress of product and capital market reforms. It is too soon to evaluate the benefits of the Cologne process.

DEFENCE

Territorial Army

11. Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will address personnel shortages in the Army by retaining larger numbers of TA units than he had previously planned. [104545]

Mr. Spellar: The restructuring of the Territorial Army following the SDR is making it better able to support the regular Army than before. I therefore have no plans to reverse these changes.

European Defence and Security Policy

15. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the role of non-NATO states in the common European defence and security policy. [104549]

Mr. Hoon: Under arrangements agreed at December's Helsinki European Council, all EU member states will be entitled to participate, on an equal basis, in EU decision making on Common Defence and Security matters. There will be no discrimination between those EU member states who are NATO Allies and those who are not.

Elvington Airfield

16. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future of Elvington airfield. [104550]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Elvington airfield is surplus and is being sold. My Department has now selected a preferred purchaser and intends to sell the property to Elvington Park Ltd. It is hoped that the sale will be concluded shortly.

Royal Ordnance

17. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of Royal Ordnance. [104551]

Mr. Kilfoyle: As I announced on 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 467W, we have entered into a long term partnering arrangement with Royal Ordnance for the supply of a wide range of ammunition products from Royal Ordnance. The arrangement, which is initially for 10 years, will provide Royal Ordnance with a stable workload worth some £100 million per year. It will provide value for money for the taxpayer by establishing a stable base from which Royal Ordnance can invest and restructure for the future.

Kosovo

18. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on peacekeeping operations in Kosovo and Bosnia. [104552]

Mr. Hoon: British forces continue to make an outstanding contribution to the international community's peace-keeping operations in Kosovo and Bosnia. In Kosovo, we contribute 3,500 troops to KFOR, while in Bosnia we intend to bring our contribution down from around 3,300 now to some 2,000 during the course of this year.

The United Kingdom remains fully committed to long-term peace and stability in the Balkans as a whole.

30. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of the weapons and equipment used by British armed forces during the Kosovo operations; and if he will make a statement. [104566]

Mr. Hoon: My Department constantly monitors the effectiveness of the weapons and equipment used by British armed forces, and we have learned valuable lessons from our experiences in Kosovo. Remedial action is being taken forward as appropriate and a report on lessons learned will be published later this year.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations about the SA 80 weapon system were made to Ministers by the Chiefs of Staff during the Kosovo campaign. [106170]

Mr. Kilfoyle: None.

Armed Forces (Homosexuals)

19. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he has taken as a result of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights on lesbians and gay men in the armed forces. [104553]

Mr. Hoon: I made a statement to the House on 12 January 2000, Official Report, columns 287–88, about implementation of the legal judgment of the European Court of Human Rights. Homosexuals are no longer excluded from service in the armed forces. All personnel, regardless of their sexual orientation, are subject to a new code of social conduct that sets out what is acceptable and unacceptable behaviour. The code is concerned with the effect of personal conduct and behaviour on operational effectiveness. I have placed a copy of the code in the Library of the House.

34. Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he is making in settling compensation claims for those service men and women discharged from the armed forces in breach of their rights under the European convention on human rights. [104570]

Mr. Spellar: In light of the ECHR's judgment on 27 September 1999, the Secretary of State for Defence authorised that settlement negotiations be entered into with those individuals discharged as a result of their homosexuality who had Employment Tribunal applications already in train and whose account is accepted as being substantially factually true. Over 60 offers of settlement have been made and, to date, three individuals have accepted those offers, and payments have been made.

Transport Aircraft

20. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action is being taken to harmonise Future Transport Aircraft requirements with those of the French and German Ministries of Defence. [104554]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The competition for the Royal Air Force's Future Transport Aircraft is being conducted on the basis of a common European Staff Requirement agreed between several European partners, including France and Germany.

Type 45 Destroyers

22. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when contracts will be signed with United Kingdom shipyards for the construction of Type 45 destroyers and other vessels for the Royal Navy. [104556]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We plan to place the order for the First-of-Class Type 45 destroyer with the Prime Contractor by the end of this year with the intention that it be built at the Marconi Marine (YSL) Ltd. yard on the Clyde. Decisions have still to be taken on the timing for follow-on Type 45 vessels but current planning assumptions are for a class of 12 ships to enter service between 2007 and 2014.

Contracts for other RN shipbuilding programmes, of which there are many over the next 10–15 years, will be signed at the appropriate point of the procurement process.

US (Discussions)

24. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next plans to visit the United States to discuss defence matters. [104558]

Mr. Hoon: I am going to the United States later today to discuss defence matters.

Cadets

25. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the annual cost to the Army, Air and Sea Cadets of paying fees to the Criminal Records Office for criminal records searches in respect of adult leaders and helpers. [104559]

Mr. Spellar: The Sea Cadet Association estimates that its use of the Criminal Records Bureau will cost around £15,000 per year. The Army Cadet Force estimates that it will spend about £20,000 per year, while the Air Training Corps has allocated £6,000 per year in future budgets for the cost of inquiries.

Service Families (Schools)

26. Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department is taking to improve access to schools for service families. [104560]

27. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to improve access to schools for service families. [104561]

Mr. Spellar: The inter departmental Service Families Task Force has achieved considerable success in improving access to schools for Service families. The Department for Education and Employment has, for the first time, made specific reference to Service children in their Code of Practice on Schools Admission. The Code directs local education authorities and school admission authorities to ensure that the needs of Service children are taken into account by considering inviting Service Children's Education, an MOD agency, to their Admission Forum. The Service Children's Education agency is now either a formal member, or is in attendance, on 16 Admission Forums for areas in England where there are large numbers of Service children. The Code of Practice also requires admission authorities to be sensitive to the position of children of parents returning from working abroad, such as Service personnel.

Armed Forces (Women)

28. Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the restrictions on posts available to women in the armed forces. [104563]

Mr. Spellar: Women cannot currently serve in the Royal Marines General Service, cap-badged posts in the Infantry and Royal Armoured Corps (including the Household Cavalry) and the RAF Regiment on the grounds of combat effectiveness. The Army is currently conducting a study into the effects of gender upon combat effectiveness that is due to report to Ministers in 2001.

Additionally in the Royal Navy women cannot serve in submarines or as mine clearance divers for medical reasons. The position will be kept under review.

Anglo-French Co-operation

29. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made since the St. Malo agreement in promoting Anglo-French co-operation in defence. [104564]

Mr. Hoon: The Letter of Intent on co-operation in crisis management and operations signed at St. Malo in December 1998 has allowed work to be taken forward on planning for non-combatant evacuation operations; joint exercises; improved links between operational headquarters; co-ordination of naval deployments; information exchanges on peacekeeping activities; Year 2000 computer problems; logistics; and arrangements for dealing with the media.

Specific examples of co-operation are: the posting of liaison officers into operational headquarters; the attachment of HMS Somerset, and later HMS Grafton, to the French FOCH Carrier Task Group in the Adriatic during the Kosovo conflict; the joint signing ceremony in New York on 25 June of Memoranda of Understanding between our respective Governments and the UN on troop availability for UN peacekeeping operations; and co-operation on media handling during the Kosovo conflict. We also signed a Mutual Logistics Support Agreement at the UK/France Summit held in November 1999.

Defence Medical Services

31. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase spending on the Defence Medical Services over the next three years. [104567]

Mr. Spellar: Following the Strategic Defence Review, an additional £140 million was made available for enhancement of the operational capability of the Defence Medical Services over the four years from 1998–99 to 2001–02. We plan to maintain increased expenditure in subsequent years.

Ballistic Missile

33. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the threat of a ballistic missile attack on the United Kingdom. [104569]

Mr. Hoon: Our current assessment is that there is no significant ballistic missile threat to the UK at present, but developments continue to be monitored closely.

Missile Systems

35. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made in assessing future requirements for beyond-visual-range air-to-air missile systems. [104571]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We are currently assessing final bids received from two companies, Matra BAe Dynamics and Raytheon Systems Ltd, to meet the RAF's requirement for a Beyond Visual Range Air-to-Air Missile. Assessment is almost complete and we hope to be in a position to announce the outcome of this competition early this year.

Merchant Ships

36. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the agreements between British merchant shipping companies and his Department on the availability of merchant ships for defence purposes. [104572]

Mr. Spellar: There are no agreements between my Department and British merchant shipping companies on the availability of merchant ships for defence. As my hon. Friend is aware the Ministry of Defence enjoys a close and productive relationship with the UK Chamber of Shipping and the DETR on defence issues, primarily through the auspices of the Shipping Defence Advisory Committee.

Navy Manpower

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the projected levels of Navy manpower for the next three years. [104555]

Mr. Spellar: The Strategic Defence Review addressed shortages in the Services and set a target for the Naval Service to bring overall strengths into line with requirements by 2002. It is on course to do so. The forecast requirement for 1 April 2002 is for 38,900 personnel. Our aim is to provide the trained strength needed to meet requirements.

Eurofighter

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current in-service date of the Eurofighter. [104568]

Mr. Hoon: The in-service date of Eurofighter, which is defined as delivery of the first aircraft, is June 2002.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the likely effectiveness of the Eurofighter when deployed from aircraft carriers. [104915]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 18 January 2000]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 24 January 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking what assessment has been made of the likely effectiveness of the Eurofighter when deployed from aircraft carriers. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

A 'navalised' version of the Eurofighter is one of the options being assessed to meet the Future Carrier Borne Aircraft (FCBA) requirement. FCBA is due to replace the Royal Navy Sea Harrier and the Royal Air Force Harrier forces, and will be required to operate from the two new carriers.

A contract has been placed with BAe Systems, to study launch and recovery design issues that would arise from the development of the Eurofighter aircraft for carrier operations. The outcome of this work, together with MOD operational effectiveness studies on the option, will be used to inform the decision on the choice of FCBA aircraft.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Eurofighter will become operational with its full complement of air-to-air and air-to-ground weaponry. [106566]

Mr. Hoon: As the date when Eurofighter will become fully operational could provide a useful indicator about our defence capability to potential adversaries, I am withholding it in accordance with Exemption 1 (Defence, Security, and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Joint Rapid Reaction Force

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the Royal Navy regarding the timescale for awarding the PFI contract for the Joint Rapid Reaction Force Roll-On Roll-Off vessels. [104089]

Mr. Spellar: One the aims of Smart Procurement has been to define more clearly the needs of the customer (in this case the Royal Navy) and to empower them within the procurement process. Members of the Royal Navy are closely involved in the project on a day to day basis and contribute fully to the discussion and resolution of all issues related to the Roll-On Roll-Off ship project.

Service Personnel (Medical Treatment)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are waiting for NHS hospital and consultant appointments relating to illnesses or accidents which interrupt their military service; how many have been waiting for more than six months; and what estimate he has made of the cost implications of delays. [104411]

Mr. Spellar: Members of the Armed Forces are entitled to full use of NHS hospitals on the same basis as civilians if appropriate military provision is not available. The MOD does not maintain overall records of those Service personnel who require secondary medical care in NHS hospitals.

A400M Project

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the states supporting the A400M aircraft project have indicated that they would purchase the aircraft; how many each would purchase; and when the first aircraft could be in service with the RAF. [104405]

Mr. Kilfoyle: None of the seven nations involved in the A400M project has made a contractual commitment to purchase the aircraft although two nations have declared a preference for the A400M. Each of the nations is addressing, within their national assessment programmes, the issue of the number of aircraft needed to fulfil their national air transport requirements but have not yet made firm decisions. We expect the aircraft selected to fulfil our Future Transport Aircraft requirement to enter service with the RAF in the latter half of this decade.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the A400M project. [105555]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We continue to aim to reach a decision in the early part of this year on our Future Transport Aircraft requirements. A400M is one of the aircraft under consideration.

Gardening Leave

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's (a) civil servants by grade and (b) service men and women by rank are (i) currently on gardening leave and (ii) have been on gardening leave for two months or more; and at what cost to his budget. [104468]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Civilian staff on gardening leave are individuals who are genuinely surplus because there is no suitable employment for them, or because their circumstances prevent them from taking up that employment. My Department monitors the position routinely and the latest available figures, excluding the Meteorological Office and Defence Evaluation and Research Agency are set out as follows:

MOD civilian staff between appointments

Civilian staff by grade[1]	Total	Total 2 months or more
Grade 7	3	3
Grade 6	1	0
MOD Police Constable	1	1
Senior Scientific Officer	1	1

Mess Manager 'B'	1	1
Administrative Officer	1	1
Total	26	21

[1] As of November 1999
[2] Includes two part-time staff

The approximate cost of these staff to the MOD budget this financial year, calculated on the basis of the length of time on gardening leave, is £314,000.

Although these figures represent a tiny proportion of the 100,000 civilian staff employed by the Ministry of Defence, my Department takes the matter very seriously. Individuals are placed on gardening leave only as a last resort and the aim, wherever possible, is to find work for staff in between appointments.

Although not recognised across all three Services, the term "gardening leave" (or "Wait Appointment" in the Royal Navy) is understood to apply to those who are fit and available for duty but for whom no post is currently available, and who are awaiting appointment. The amount of time involved for individuals is usually very short, and personnel move in and out of this category on a daily basis.

Unexploded Ordnance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's estimate of the percentage of unexploded ordnance which results from cluster bombs dropped from (a) 5,000 feet, (b) 10,000 feet, (c) 15,000 feet, (d) 20,000 feet and (e) 25,000 feet. [104806]

Mr. Spellar: Approximately 5 per cent. of the bomblets within a Cluster Bomb fail to detonate when they impact. Regardless of the height from which they are dropped, this figure does not vary.

AWE Aldermaston

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the conviction by the Environment Agency in December of AWE Aldermaston for unauthorised discharges of tritium. [105066]

Mr. Kilfoyle: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Harry Cohen, dated 24 January 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking if he will make a statement on the conviction by the Environment Agency in December of AWE Aldermaston for unauthorised discharges of tritium.

On 13 December 1999, Hunting-BRAE, the current management and operating contractor for the Atomic Weapons Establishment, pleaded guilty at Newbury Magistrates' Court to three charges in connection with the unauthorised discharge of low level tritium into the Aldermaston Stream and were fined a total of £17,500 plus costs of £4,220. The Environment Agency, who issued the summons, have stated that the discharges have no significant health or environmental consequences. They also accept that the stream is the best available method of discharge and have allowed AWE to continue with this. For their part, Hunting-BRAE have stated that the discharges were made in the belief that the Environment Agency were aware of the situation and had condoned it.

Indonesia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is his Department's policy on requests from the Indonesian Government for back up support for military hardware already sold to them; [104836]

(2) what requests have been made by the Indonesian Government over the last 12 months for the renewal and replacement of military equipment that has been sold to the Indonesian regime; and if he will make a statement. [104835]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Requests for licensable back-up support for existing military hardware overseas are considered case by case in line with the criteria which the Foreign Secretary announced to the House on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29W and the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports.

While the exact details are commercially confidential, we understand that prior to the EU embargo a number of British companies were in discussion with the Indonesian Government about the supply of both spares for existing items and new defence equipment.

The EU embargo lapsed at midnight on 16 January 2000. Any future UK defence equipment to Indonesia will again be subject to case by case consideration under the criteria referred to above.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105805]

Mr. Kilfoyle: It is my Department's aim, in line with wider Government policy, to create a non-smoking working environment, in so far as this reflects the wishes of staff. In fact, many MOD sites already operate a no smoking policy. Detailed guidance on smoking policy within MOD is promulgated in the departmental Health and Safety Handbook, Joint Service Publication 375, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Property Disposals

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what procedures his Department has to ensure that elected representatives for an area are consulted on possible future disposals of MOD property in that area prior to discussions with local government officers. [105149]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 17 January 2000]: My Department liaises closely with local authorities in considering options for the future of defence sites to ensure that local planning issues are taken into account in deliberations. Decisions to close MOD establishments and subsequently dispose of sites are taken by Ministers and colleagues, and I write to inform hon. Members before our officials inform local authority representatives.

Departmental Lawyers

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by (a) service, (b) rank or grade and (c) location of workplace the numbers of qualified lawyers working for his Department. [105651]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The table gives the service, rank and location of qualified lawyers working for my Department.

[1] As the Naval Service does not have a dedicated legal service, not all qualified RN personnel are currently serving in legal appointments

In addition to those given in the table my Department also uses the services of the Treasury Solicitors Litigation team, based in London; the Crown Solicitor in Belfast and Robson Mclean, a commercial firm under contract to supply advice on Scottish legal matters. Various independent specialist solicitors and Counsel are used as the need arises.

Departmental Fees

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the fees his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies collect; how much has been raised or it is anticipated will be raised from each of these fees from 1989–90 to 2004–05; and which of these fees count as negative expenditure. [105997]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Unlike certain other departments the Ministry of Defence, its agencies and associated public bodies do not raise fees under legislative authority at present. Charges are, however, raised for a number of activities which are carried out on a discretionary basis, and figures are provided in the table for those from which the largest amounts of revenue are realised. These figures are derived from those reported to the Treasury and Parliament in the Department's annual Fees and Charges return and for that reason do not extend beyond 2000–01.

All the charges listed can be used to offset the expenditure to which they relate. In some cases, retained receipts will count as negative expenditure in national accounts aggregates but in other cases, may score as tax revenues.

Charges are raised for a number of other activities of insufficient value to warrant inclusion in the Fees and Charges return, but this information is not held centrally and could not be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost.

European Peacekeeping Corps.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the planned operational range of the European Peacekeeping Corps. [106394]

Mr. Hoon: Member states of the European Union have expressed their determination to be able to act in support of the Common Foreign and Security Policy. They have set themselves a headline goal describing the level of capabilities they wish to achieve by 2003. They are not setting up a standing peacekeeping corps. The scale and range of possible future operations will depend on circumstances.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what specialised British sub-units will be tasked to the European Peacekeeping Corps. [106193]

Mr. Hoon: At the Helsinki European Council, EU member states committed themselves to improving their military capabilities, including a specific headline goal of being able to assemble, deploy rapidly and sustain up to 50,000–60,000 troops for Petersberg Tasks, including peacekeeping. There is no intention to create a Standing European Peacekeeping Corps.

EU member states have not yet defined their national contributions towards the headline goal. In the event of an EU-led crisis management operation, the make-up of any UK contribution would depend on the specific circumstances of the operation and UK commitments elsewhere.

Engineers

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals within the teaching and management staff of the Department of Specialist Ground Training (air force) and comparable training establishments within the Army and Royal Navy are members of professional engineering institutions; and if he will identify those roles which require individuals to be chartered engineers. [106424]

Mr. Spellar: The number of individuals within the teaching and management staff of the Department of Specialist Ground Training who are members of professional engineering institutions is 34. The number of posts which require individuals to be chartered engineers is two.

Based on current information supplied by the Army, the number of individuals within the teaching and management staff at the Royal School of Military Engineering at Chatham and Minley (plus associated schools) who are members of professional engineering institutions is 13, and there are nine posts/roles that require chartered engineers. At the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers Training Group at Arborfield and Bordon, the figures are respectively 72 and seven. At the Royal School of Signals, Blandford, the figures are 12 and zero respectively.

The Royal Navy do not hold figures on the number of teaching and management staff at RN engineering training establishments who are members of professional engineering institutions. RN training is designed to enable individuals to qualify for the relevant engineering institution. Membership of institutions is encouraged and supported, but it is currently up to each individual whether he or she applies for membership.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the compatibility of armed services engineering training courses validation and quality procedures with those of higher education colleges. [106428]

Mr. Spellar: Wherever possible, Armed Forces engineering courses are linked to civilian academic or vocational qualifications. Where such qualifications are awarded, in addition to the individual Service's own validation and quality procedures, the training is also subject to validation by the appropriate civilian body in the same way as equivalent qualifications awarded by higher education colleges and universities. This validation is extensive and can include, for example, in the case of NVQs, external verification and inspection by awarding bodies, National Training Organisations (NTOs) and/or the standard setting bodies of the industry concerned, the Training Standards Council and the local TEC.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to offer training courses in engineering to private sector businesses. [106426]

Mr. Spellar: The Armed Forces already offer places on their engineering training courses to private sector business, by offering available spare capacity, wherever possible. To reduce the overhead costs of training, the three Service Training Agencies are continuously seeking to develop these opportunities further.

Training

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evaluation he has made of training course validation processes (i) within each of the armed services and (ii) between the armed services. [106425]

Mr. Spellar: The Armed Forces employ the "Systems Approach to Training" methodology for the quality management of the development and delivery of their training courses. This conforms to current best practice in other NATO Armed Forces and is designed primarily to ensure that Service personnel are trained in a cost-effective manner to meet the high standards of performance required in operational situations.

All three Services allocate resources to the development of validation processes and to their application to training courses. In this context, validation involves confirming that courses meet their stated aims and that students have met the prescribed standards, and confirming that the course aims continue to reflect operational needs.

The three Services co-operate closely in the development of these processes and take account of best practice in both military and civilian training organisations. They have recently published a joint approach to a quality standard based on the "Systems Approach to Training" which confirms common standards for the management of training across all three Services, while taking account of the differing training requirements of each individual Services.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to merge the training functions of the armed services. [106427]

Mr. Spellar: A number of training functions are already being delivered on a joint service or lead service basis. The scope for further rationalisation of training between the three Services and the Civil Service is being examined as part of the wide ranging and fundamental review of defence training and education announced in the House by my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Robertson, the then Secretary of State for Defence, on 22 July 1999, Official Report, columns 612–13W.

Sonar

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the Government have to conduct and publish research into the environmental effect of sonar weapons on marine mammals. [105315]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Ministry of Defence does not use sonar weapons and has not, therefore, undertaken any primary research into the environmental effects of such devices on marine mammals. We do use active and passive sonars as sensors and all MOD research involving the use of active sonars is assessed to ensure that it complies with the European Union Habitat Directive and Joint Nature Conservancy Council guidelines. The output from any such research is published via international journals and as conference papers in accordance with normal scientific practice.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the Government have to develop a long-range low-frequency sonar system for use on marine vessels. [105314]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 20 January 2000]: We are currently developing a low frequency sonar which we plan to fit to the Type 23 Frigate.

Overstretch

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent proposals his Department has put to the Treasury to alleviate the effect of overstretch on the armed forces. [106004]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 20 January 2000]: We announced, before Christmas, enhancements to the Longer Separated Service Allowance and Longer Service at Sea Bonus in recognition of the sacrifices of those who spend long periods away from home. We have also reduced the numbers of personnel on operations in the Balkans, Gulf and Falkland Islands.

Press Releases

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many press releases his Department issued in each year from 1995 to 1999. [106121]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Numbers
1995	149
1996	176
1997	221
1998	294
1999	416

British Forces Post Office

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future location of the UK base of the British Forces Post Office. [104562]

Mr. Spellar: The future location of the UK base of the British Forces Post Office is currently under review as part of my Department's Strategic Development Plan for Greater London.

Battle of Britain

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what funding he will make available for the maintenance of the RAF Battle of Britain Chapel and the associated Hurricane and Spitfire aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [106030]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Financial provision for the maintenance of the RAF Battle of Britain Chapel and its enclave is some £20-£30,000 annually. As regards the glass fibre replica Hurricane and Spitfire aircraft, it is currently Royal Air Force policy that no public funds should be spent on maintaining such display aircraft, commonly referred to as "Gate Guardians". Funding for the recent refurbishment of the Hurricane was raised privately. Similar funding for the Spitfire is in the process of being raised.

Royal Irish Regiment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (a) what representations he has received following publication of a group photograph of the Royal Irish Regiment in The Andersonstown News on 15 January, (b) where and on what date the photograph was taken, (c) how many soldiers and officers of each rank from battalions participated in the photograph, (d) what rank of soldier took the photograph, (e) what rank of officer supervised the photoshoot, (f) by what means the banner displayed in the photograph was obtained, (g) what transport arrangements were made to bring the banner into military barracks, (h) what was the purpose of the photograph, (i) where the film was developed and how many prints were (i) made, (ii) distributed and (iii) sold, (j) what disciplinary action has been taken consequent to the incident, (k) what assessment he has made of the impact of the incident on community relations and (l) what statement the Ministry has made to the press on the issue; and if he will make a statement. [106410]

Mr. Spellar: The circumstances surrounding the publication of a photograph of the Royal Irish Regiment in the Andersonstown News on 15 January 2000 are currently under investigation by the Special Investigations Branch, Royal Military Police. I will write to my hon. Friend when the investigation is complete and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Prison Ships

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the viability of using aircraft carriers moored in Portsmouth Harbour as prison ships. [106177]

Mr. Spellar: My Department has not considered the viability of using aircraft carriers moored in Portsmouth Harbour as prison ships, nor has it been asked to.

Recruitment Advertising

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his expenditure was on national recruitment advertising in (a) cinemas, (b) television, (c) radio, (d) print and (e) posters during each month since April 1999; and what his monthly budget is in each category for (i) January, (ii) February and (iii) March 2000. [106184]

Mr. Spellar: The national recruitment advertising expenditure for the categories requested, in respect of the Naval Service and the RAF, broken down by month is as follows:

	Cinema	Television	Radio	Print	Posters

The Army do not maintain records of recruit advertising spend on a monthly basis. The general pattern of advertising runs in cycles with the peaks occurring in April/May and September. The expenditure, inclusive of the Regular Army and the Territorial Army, broken down where possible, is as follows:

	April-December 1999	January-March 1999
Cinema	—	—
Television	3,015,279	850,000
Radio	535,274	425,000
Print	1,109,760	240,000
Posters	138,431	40,000

The hon. Member may also wish to know that, in addition to the above expenditure, the Armed Forces spent about £267,000 on advertising via the Internet from April to December 1999, with a further forecast spend of £120,000 between January and March 2000.

Recruitment advertising expenditure for MOD civilians is not held in the form requested. However, the total forecast expenditure on national recruitment advertising for civilian recruitment for financial year 1999–2000 is £4.4 million.

SA80 Weapon System

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the SA80 weapon system modifications proposed by Heckler and Koch in 1997; and if he has introduced a modification programme. [106182]

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if a modification programme for the SA80 weapon system was implemented following the proposals from Heckler and Koch referred to in the letter from the Minister for Defence Procurement to the Defence Committee of 2 June 1997; what estimate was submitted by Heckler and Koch of the cost of their proposals; and if the SA80s used in the Kosovo campaign were modified as a result of these proposals. [106173]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Design Authority for SA80, formerly Royal Ordnance but now Heckler and Koch UK (Ltd.), was tasked in 1996 to investigate the reliability of the SA80 weapon system. Heckler and Koch reported in 1998 that there might be underlying problems with the reliability of the system and presented their proposals for modifications. A contract was placed in mid-1998 with Heckler and Koch for the modification of 200 weapons to be used for trials to determine the effectiveness of these modifications. Deliveries of these modified weapons were made in January 1999. The MOD conducted user trials in hot and cold climatic conditions with a range of NATO ammunition types. The trials were completed in July 1999 and the formal Design Authority report was delivered to the MOD in late December 1999. The trials confirmed that, after modification, there were significant improvements in the reliability of both the SA80 rifle and Light Support Weapon. Urgent work is in hand to assess the wider implications of the Design Authority report, including the cost, and we expect to make a decision on any modification programme by the end of March 2000.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the SA80 weapon system remains suspended from the NATO Nominated Weapons List. [106183]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The SA80 weapon system remains suspended from the NATO Nominated Weapons List, the list of weapons for use in the testing of NATO approved ammunition types. This suspension in itself has no impact on the operational effectiveness of the weapon.

Nancekuke

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral statement of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 825W, to whom it was intended that the decontaminated plant and equipment disposed of from Nancekuke would be clearly identifiable. [106750]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The locations where decontaminated plant and other materials were disposed of on the Nancekuke site were identified as a matter of good land management practice.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral statement of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 825W, whether the decontamination and disposal provisions at Nancekuke involved placing equipment used at Nancekuke in mine-shafts. [106749]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Prior to the closure at Nancekuke, the chemical plant was decontaminated and dismantled. Obsolete plant and some scrap metal was disposed of in a disused quarry and in two old mineshafts on the site. As part of a regular land quality assessment, recent surface soil and water samples were analysed and showed no signs of contamination from toxic agents. We are currently consulting with representatives of local authorities, the Environment Agency for England and Wales and other interested parties, how to take forward the land quality assessment work.

GPS Guided Munitions

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to acquire GPS guided munitions for the Royal Air Force. [106567]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The UK is procuring Storm Shadow, a conventionally armed stand-off missile which utilises Global Positioning Systems (GPS) technology, to provide a precision capability to defeat hardened static targets in almost all weather conditions. Storm Shadow has an In Service Date of 2002.

We are also considering the procurement of precision guided munitions to improve the accuracy with which our forces can deliver ballistic bombs, and to provide a capability for them to be delivered in almost all weather conditions. Various technological solutions are available that could provide autonomous guidance for a weapon which met such a requirement, including the use of GPS technology.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105877]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Management (Delegations)

Mr. Miller: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what delegations have been made in 1999 under the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992; to whom those delegations were made; and what were the main conditions attached to them. [106534]

Mr. Stringer: Since the last report to Parliament, 14 January 1999, Official Report, columns 253–54W, new delegations have replaced previous ones to reflect the creation of the devolved administrations and machinery of government changes. Ministers and office holders in charge of departments[1] have been given delegated authority (from 1 July 1999) under the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992:

(a) to prescribe the qualifications (so far as they relate to age, knowledge, ability, professional attainment, aptitude, potential, health and coping with the demands of the job) for the appointment of home civil servants (with the exception of the Fast Stream Development Programme) in their respective departments; and

(b) to determine in respect of home civil servants in their respective departments the number and grading of posts outside the Senior Civil Service and the terms and conditions of employment in so far as they relate to the following:

i. classification of staff, with the exception of the Senior Civil Service;

ii. remuneration, with the exception of the Senior Civil Service;

iii. allowances;

iv. expenses;

v. holidays, hours of work and attendance;

vi. part-time and other working arrangements;

vii. performance and promotion;

viii. retirement age and redundancy;

ix. re-deployment of staff within the Home Civil Service.

In some cases, for staff appointed by statutory office holders, the Minister for the Civil Service was statutorily required to give consent to terms and conditions of service. For such staff, delegation has been effected by waiving that requirement, subject to the condition attached to delegation.

The delegation was subject to the condition that recipients comply with the provisions of the Civil Service Management Code as amended from time to time. Copies of the Civil Service Management Code are available in the Library of the House. All previous delegations and authorisations made under the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992 were revoked with effect from 1 July 1999.

Similar delegations were also made to the National Assembly for Wales and the First Minister of the Scottish Executive. These came into effect on 7 May and 1 July 1999 respectively and were also subject to the condition that they comply with the provisions of the Civil Service Management Code as amended from time to time.

[1] The statutory office holders are:

Commissioners of Inland Revenue

Head of the Registry of Friendly Societies, being the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies and the First Commissioner of the Building Societies Commission

Chief Charity Commissioner

Commissioners of Customs and Excise

Crown Estate Commissioners

Director General of Electricity Supply

Director General of Fair Trading

Director of the Serious Fraud Office

Government Actuary

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in England

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in Wales

Government Reports

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the Government's annual reports on non-departmental bodies and executive agencies will be published. [106535]

Mr. Stringer: The Executive Non-Departmental Public Bodies' 1999 Report and the 1999 Executive Agencies Report will be published simultaneously in March.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what action she is taking to reduce smoking in her Department. [105807]

Mr. Stringer: Restrictions on smoking in Cabinet Office buildings have been in effect since 1 August 1989. Smoking is permitted only in designated areas and rooms.

Cabinet Office Staff Welfare promotes National No Smoking Day each year and has a web page on the Department's local intranet site giving tips on how to quit smoking. The Staff Welfare Officer is also available to give help and advice to anyone who needs it.

The Cabinet Office Agencies all have similar no smoking policies in place.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

World Trade Organisation

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to strengthen the World Trade Organisation's capacity to monitor the effect of present trade agreements on developing countries. [105063]

Clare Short: The WTO does not have a mandate to monitor the impact of trade agreements. It does have a responsibility to monitor developments in world trade and the implementation of trade agreements which it fulfils with resources from its core budget. My Department has committed £16 million of trade related technical assistance to developing countries, of which details have been placed in the House of Commons Library. This includes payments to a trust fund at the WTO to develop the capacity of developing countries to fulfil their responsibilities as WTO members and implement agreements. It also includes support for the capacity building programmes in UNCTAD and the ITC, and research to assess aspects of the effect of trade liberalisation on developing countries, for example, the effects of trade liberalisation on poverty, and the impact of WTO agreements such as the Sanitary and Phytosanitary Agreement. Studies on the impact of the Uruguay Round trade agreements by the World Bank and other bodies show that developing countries should benefit, relative to their GDP, as much as, if not more than, developed countries. Similar studies in advance of the expected new Round by the European Commission and others, offer a similar prognosis.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent research reports she has received on the economic impact of the first five years of the World Trade Organisation trading regime on developing countries. [105584]

Clare Short: The WTO, World Bank and the academic community have completed many reports on the economic impact of the World Trade Organisation trading regime. Ex-post assessment of the impact of changes to the world trade rules agreed under the Uruguay Round presents problems as it is almost impossible to disentangle the ex-post impact of multilateral trade liberalisation from the many other factors that have an impact on world trade and developing country economies. However, economic modelling can help to give some indication of the possible benefits which have been estimated to be between $13 billion and $125 billion for developing countries.

This research work also suggests that developing countries stand to gain at least as much as developed countries from the Uruguay Round as a proportion of GDP, although, the distribution of benefits among developing countries is not evenly spread. South East Asia does well, there are also benefits for South Asia, but sub-Saharan Africa may face a small welfare loss.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations her Department has made to the World Trade Organisation concerning procedural reform. [106334]

Clare Short: My Department has not made any representations to the World Trade Organisation concerning procedural reform. This work is being led by the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the United States of America concerning reform of the World Trade Organisation since 1 December 1999. [106333]

Clare Short: I have not had any discussions with colleagues from the United States concerning reform of the World Trade Organisation since the WTO in Seattle.

Kosovo

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what has been the total cost of the humanitarian programme in Kosovo since the beginning of the conflict; and how much has been disbursed in (a) cash and (b) in materials and products. [105689]

Clare Short: My Department has committed £100 million to the humanitarian and rehabilitation programme in Kosovo since March 1999. Direct procurement of goods and equipment by the Department amounts to £40 million. Specific contributions to international organisations for the purchase of goods and equipment amount to £5 million. The balance of £55 million has been committed to a range of programmes through international agencies, international and local NGOs, commercial contractors and the DFID Field Offices in Pristina, Skopje, and Tirana. The vast majority of these programmes involve some procurement of goods and equipment, but information on the precise breakdown of programmes between goods and other expenditure is not readily available.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the performance of the United Nations mission in Kosovo. [106453]

Mr. Foulkes: United Nations Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) face a daunting and complex task in implementing SCR 1244.

The range of challenges includes meeting humanitarian needs over the winter, setting up basic services in health and education, establishing the rule of law, and putting a system of revenue collection in place. They are also undertaking voter registration in order to hold elections as soon as feasible. These and other tasks have at times been hampered because human and financial inputs have been slow to mobilise. But the Mission is progressively doing a good job and has our support.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with the IMF and World Bank concerning the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative. [106330]

Clare Short: We have regular discussions with the Managing Director of the IMF and the President of the World Bank on a range of issues, including the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative. Through our Executive Director's office in Washington, we are in day-to-day contact with World Bank and IMF management. Currently, we are exchanging ideas on how the poverty reduction strategy approach can be implemented most effectively, so that the enhanced debt relief provided under the HIPC initiative can have the maximum possible benefit for the poor. We also continue to press for the early implementation of the revised HIPC Initiative.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has received from non-Governmental organisations concerning expansion of the number of countries eligible for debt relief under the heavily indebted poor countries initiative. [106640]

Clare Short: I have received a number of letters requesting an increase from 41 to 52 to the list of countries eligible for HIPC relief. Countries can be added to the HIPC list as demonstrated by the inclusion of Malawi. However such additions require international agreement. Non-HIPC countries can receive up to 67 per cent. relief on their bilateral debts from the Paris Club of official creditors.

Bilateral Debt Relief

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with local non-governmental organisations about their role in monitoring poverty reduction projects financed as a result of bilateral debt relief. [106639]

Clare Short: I refer to my answer to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 19 January 2000, Official Report, column 479W, on the monitoring of bilateral debt relief. I met Directors of the British Agencies Overseas Group on 21 December, and discussed with them the importance of civil society being involved in developing and monitoring poverty reduction strategies.

Departmental Expenditure

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of her departmental budget in 1998–99 was spent in Asia. [106328]

Clare Short: The percentage of the DFID Bilateral programme expenditure spent in 1998–99 in Asia was 28 per cent. This represents 14 per cent. of the total DFID programme. In addition some of our multilateral contributions will be directed towards Asia, but we cannot determine how much.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her Department's planned spending on (a) Latin America, (b) Asia, (c) Africa and (d) Europe is in financial year 1999–2000. [106695]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development's (DFID) planned expenditure on Bilateral Country Programmes for the current (1999–2000) financial year is as follows:

	£ million
(a) Latin America	33
(b) Asia	315
(c) Africa	447
(d) Europe	196

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact of an increase in her Department's spending in the Balkans on projects in southern hemisphere. [106340]

Clare Short: No financial or material resources were diverted from projects in the Southern Hemisphere as a result of the increased spending in the Balkans.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentages of her departmental budget in 1998–99 were spent in (a) Africa and (b) Latin America. [106694]

Clare Short: The percentage of the DFID Bilateral programme expenditure spent in 1998–99 in (a) Africa and (b) Latin America is as follows:

Percentage

	As a proportion of Bilateral expenditure	As a proportion of total DFID programme
Africa	39.0	19.0
Latin America	3.0	1.0

Special Advisers

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will place the curriculum vitae of her special advisers in the Library. [106343]

Mr. Foulkes: Owing to the personal nature of this request, we are not obliged to supply the information requested.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in her Department employs a special adviser. [106765]

Mr. Foulkes: I employ no special advisers.

Ministerial Offices

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the cost of the refurbishment of her Department's ministerial offices. [106342]

Mr. Foulkes: Since 1997 our Department has spent the following amounts on the refurbishment of ministerial offices, which include replacement furniture and redecoration:

Year	£
1997	7,978
1998	7,376

The figures for 1999 are not yet available.

Indigenous Cultures

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made to the IMF and the World bank concerning respect for indigenous cultures. [106641]

Mr. Foulkes: We have made no direct representations to the IMF and World bank concerning respect for indigenous cultures. But we continue to pay close attention to the development of World bank Country Assistance Strategies, especially the social impact on marginalised or vulnerable groups, and we also keep a close eye on World bank safeguard policies.

UN Reform

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her criteria are for assessing the progress of United Nations reform. [106456]

Mr. Foulkes: The overriding criterion in the field of development is the contribution which the UN and its funds, programmes and specialised agencies make to achieving the International Development Targets for poverty eradication, agreed by the entire UN membership. Better UN performance will require continuing efforts to focus the work of UN development agencies where they can be most effective in helping meet the Targets, to link resources more closely to objectives and outputs, and to strengthen co-ordination within the UN family and between the UN and other development institutions, particularly the World Bank. The UN must also improve its response to conflict, which threatens poverty reduction in many poor countries and continue to work with others to develop and implement the statistical systems needed to measure year-on-year progress towards the Targets. The UK will continue to support the UN and its development agencies in improving their effectiveness on all these fronts.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent progress has been made in reforming the United Nations. [106455]

Mr. Foulkes: In the field of Development the process of institutional modernisation started by the UN Secretary General in 1997 has improved the impact of the UN, though much remains to be done. New and improved strategic co-ordinating mechanisms have been established to enhance the UN's development policy cohesion. The pilot UN Development Assistance Framework has begun to increase co-ordination between UN agencies and between the UN and other development institutions at country level and will be extended rapidly to more countries. Agencies such as the World Health Organisation (WHO) and the UN Industrial Development Organisation (UNIDO) have established clearer objectives, a sharper focus on clearly defined core activities, sound finances and better management. UNDP and UNICEF have made progress in developing management systems that link resources more closely to objectives and results. We are encouraging all UN development agencies to modernise their management and organisation to increase their effectiveness in helping meet the International Development Targets.

Departmental Premises

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the premises purchased for use by her Department since 1 May 1997 and their cost. [106643]

Mr. Foulkes: No premises have been purchased by our Department since 1 May 1997.

Aid Suspensions

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development to which countries her Department has suspended aid since 1 May 1997; and what was the reason in each case. [106332]

Mr. Foulkes: Our bilateral co-operation programme with the Government of Pakistan was suspended on 15 October 1999, in response to the military coup of 12 October. We continue to provide assistance to poor people through non-governmental channels.

Our bilateral co-operation programme with the Government of Sierra Leone was suspended on 28 May 1997, in response to the military coup. The programme recommenced again in July 1999 following the Lomé peace agreement.

North Caucasus

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department has provided for the people of Chechnya since 1 December 1999. [106335]

Clare Short: Since 1 December 1999, DFID has contributed $145,000 (£893,000) to the UN Inter Agency Appeal for internally displaced people in the North Caucasus. The contribution was split between the World Food Programme ($1,000,000), the United Nations Children's Fund ($250,000), the World Health Organisation ($100,000) and the UN Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs ($100,000). In November, DFID contributed £500,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) appeal for the North Caucasus; ICRC work in the region is ongoing. The UK has also contributed through our share of the 1.2 million euro pledged by the EU.

British Council

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the projected funding from her Department to the British Council for the financial year (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02. [106341]

Clare Short: The resources set aside by my Department for the Grant-in-aid to the British Council (£30 million 1998–99, £31 million in 1999–2000, £32 million in 2000–01 and £33 million in 2001–02) have been transferred to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. My Department therefore no longer provides core funding for the British Council.

The British Council continues to be a key provider of services, on a commercial basis, to implement my Department's programmes.

Departmental Public Information Line

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many calls were made to her Department's public information line in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [106337]

Clare Short: In 1997–98 our Public Inquiry Point received 2,410 telephone calls. In 1998–99 this rose to around 5,400.

Departmental Website

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many complaints she has received from the general public about the effectiveness of the search engine on her Department's website. [106338]

Clare Short: In the last year we have received six complaints about the effectiveness of the search engine.

Russia

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funds from the TACIS programme have gone to Russia in the past six months. [106336]

Clare Short: We have been unable to obtain information in the precise form requested. However, contracts totalling euro 56,950,523 financed from the TACIS Russia programme commenced during the six months up to 20 January 2000.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

House of Lords

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Council when she intends to set up the joint Committee to consider the report of the Royal Commission on the Reform of the House of Lords; and if she will make a statement. [105669]

Mrs. Beckett: The Government set out in its White Paper "Modernising Parliament—Reforming the House of Lords" (Cm 4183), that

> "longer term reform would be considered by both Houses"

after the Royal Commission had reported.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Organised Fraud

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to publish the report of the independent review of organised fraud. [106947]

Mr. Darling: Last February, I asked John Scampion, Social Fund Commissioner, to review the way we tackled organised fraud. Mr. Scampion has completed his review and I have placed a copy of his report in the Library.

Organised fraud occurs across the Social Security system. It includes forgery, theft and other abuse of instruments of payment, operation of multiple false identities, and fraud by landlords and tenants. Mr. Scampion was asked specifically to consider how we could counter such threats, in particular through prevention, by designing structures and processes to minimise risk and secure the system against fraud.

At present the Benefits Agency has a unit dedicated to countering organised fraud which Mr. Scampion has commended for its energy, skill and professionalism. Within local authorities there is very little co-ordinated action against organised fraud.

Mr. Scampion's report makes a number of recommendations I will be considering further, but in the meantime I can announce that I will:

- set up a new national benefits intelligence unit to co-ordinate and extend intelligence on Social Security fraud, as the bedrock for both prevention and detection;
- overhaul and strengthen the capability and professionalism of investigators to tackle organised benefit fraud right across the benefit system. I will appoint a senior civil servant to manage the central organised fraud investigation service and to act as the Head of Profession for all benefit fraud investigators;
- set up new arrangements with local authorities to ensure investigations are targeted properly across the Social Security system;
- pursue (as announced last week) changes to the funding arrangements for local authority investigation work by developing a completely new anti-fraud incentive framework to be introduced from April 2001.

All of this will contribute to a significant strengthening of our defences against organised fraud and our ability to tackle it where it occurs.

In addition, as I have already announced, our plans to pay benefits through the banking system are a major step in preventing organised fraud attacks on our present, paper based, payment mechanisms.

Child Support Agency

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment the CSA has made of the contact rate between non-resident fathers and their children; and if he will make a statement. [104875]

Angela Eagle: No such assessment has been made as liability for child support is not linked to whether a non-resident parent has contact with his child(ren).

However, research[1] Shows that there is a consistent relationship between contact and the payment of child maintenance, although it is difficult to establish causality. Those who are currently paying maintenance tend to have a greater level of contact with their children than those who do not. Additionally, research[2] suggests that non-resident parents would be less likely to pay the full amount of their maintenance assessment if they lost contact with their children.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105857]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the right hon. Member to the written answer from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 519W.

Winter Fuel Payments

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent arrangements he has put in place to advertise the winter fuel payments for the elderly; and what percentage of those entitled to the payment have received it in the last three months. [106045]

Angela Eagle: A leaflet-based information campaign began in the autumn to inform and reassure those eligible of how and when payments for this winter would be made. National and regional press advertising also took place before Christmas to inform eligible pensioners that payments were currently being made, and provided information on what to do if they had not yet received a payment. An estimated 98 per cent. of those entitled have received their payments.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when Benefits Agency offices will be instructed to pay heating allowance to men aged over 60 years. [106178]

Angela Eagle: Winter Fuel Payments have always been available to men aged 60 and over who are in receipt of Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance and their benefit includes a pensioner premium.

Payments due to people aged 60 and over who are newly eligible to Winter Fuel Payments because of the recent European Court of Justice ruling, will be made as soon as possible.

To ensure these payments are made correctly, it will be necessary to determine the names and addresses of those people who are newly eligible.

We will be able to identify some people through current Departmental records. However, the majority may have had no need to contact the Department for a long period and the information we hold may not be up to date. Therefore, we will need to introduce a claims process to determine their precise entitlement.

This process will need to be developed carefully. The Benefits Agency is currently working on this and other operational issues to determine the best way to deliver the payments.

An announcement will be made as soon as possible once our plans are further advanced.

Pensioner Incomes

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the income that two pensioners in examples 1 and 2 of page 122 of the Opportunities for All report could expect to receive from the minimum income guarantee, assuming that benefit is increased in line with income. [105811]

Mr. Rooker: The examples shown in "Opportunities for All" demonstrate how the State Second Pension and Stakeholder Pension will help those with low or interrupted earnings. The estimated weekly incomes of £84 and £91 in the two examples should be set against the current minimum income guarantee of £75 a week.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of (a) average pensioner income and (b) average earnings in (a) Tamworth, (b) Staffordshire and (c) the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available. [105153]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

New Earnings Survey

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what targets he has set for (a) the reduction in the number of pensioners living below the poverty line and what is his definition of this term and (b) the reduction in the number of pensioners reliant on means-tested benefits. [105473]

Mr. Rooker: We have set out our strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion in "Opportunity for All" (Cm 4445). The indicators of success, against which we shall monitor our progress, covers the position of pensioners living on low incomes. Our Green Paper "Partnership in Pensions" describes how State Second Pension and Stakeholder Pensions will over the long term reduce pensioner reliance on means-tested benefits.

Benefit Payment Methods

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what arrangements he has made to ensure that recipients of pensions and benefits are aware that they may be paid in cash after 2003. [105331]

Mr. Rooker: The majority of benefit customers are paid by girocheque, order book or automated credit transfer (ACT) to a bank account. In some cases, the Department makes payment in cash to the customer.

Following the move to ACT from 2003 customers will have their benefits paid into a bank account but will continue to have a choice of where they access their cash, with those who wish to collect at post offices still being able to do so. Our information leaflets and forms will be updated in line with the revised payment arrangements. Arrangements to meet other information needs of our customers arising from the change are being developed.

Councillors (Incapacity Benefit)

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what incidental costs can be offset from a councillor's basic allowance when assessing their entitlement to incapacity benefit. [105517]

Mr. Bayley: The benefit rules permit limited work to be undertaken by people in certain circumstances without affecting their right to claim incapacity benefits. Work undertaken as a councillor is disregarded for the purposes of determining whether a person is incapable of work. However, Incapacity Benefit is reduced pound for pound where the net amount of the councillor's allowance exceeds a set limit, currently £49.50. In assessing the net amount of the councillor's allowance to be taken into account any expenses incurred in connection with the person's membership of the council are ignored. Such expenses are not specified in regulations but may include items such as clothes, travel costs and telephone calls.

We propose to bring forward regulations in April as part of the annual up-rating exercise to increase the councillor's allowance limit from £49.50 to £58.50. This significant increase will align it with the therapeutic earnings limit in Incapacity Benefit.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105794]

Mr. Rooker: In general, this Department has developed a range of initiatives that address issues around the ill-effects of smoking. Smoking is restricted to designated areas throughout the Department. A review of the policies is planned in the business year 2000–01, with a view to further reducing smoking within the Department as a whole.

More specifically, Agencies within the Department have taken the following action.

Local Benefits Agency managers have authority to organise local initiatives on health, including quitting smoking, and Benefits Agency Central Services regularly distribute literature on smoking and how to give up to all Benefits Agency staff.

In Headquarters staff are given the opportunity to attend regular Health Fair days which address a number of healthy living issues, including the benefits of non-smoking. They are also invited to attend Quit Smoking clinics which support staff through the quitting process by means of follow up group meetings. Written advice on the ill-effects of smoking and giving up is made widely available to all staff in Headquarters.

The War Pensions Agency have developed a range of initiatives in line with Cabinet Office recommendations. These include health and welfare initiatives such as awareness exhibitions that have included exhibits on the ill-effects of smoking. The Agency intends to issue literature to staff this year on specific health issues that will include the benefits of non-smoking.

Future action on smoking and quitting the habit within the Child Support Agency will be influenced by the outcome of the Agency's recent stress audit, which is currently being evaluated and the provisional findings of the audit are due in early March.

Pensions (Non-residents)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what action he proposes to take to ensure that UK citizens whose entitlement to a British state pension is partially based on contributions made abroad are not prevented from receiving their full pension if they retire in an EU member state; [105488]

(2) what is his estimate of the cost to the Exchequer in each of the next five financial years of allowing those British citizens who have made contributions to their pensions while working abroad, to receive their full pension entitlement if they are (a) not ordinarily resident in the UK and (b) not ordinarily resident in the UK, but live within the EU; [105490]

(3) how many UK citizens receive a pension which is partly dependent on contributions made while resident in (a) Canada and (b) all other countries outside the UK. [105489]

Mr. Rooker: Where a person has paid contributions to the Social Security scheme of a country outside the UK, any pension entitlement from those contributions is decided and paid by the country concerned. No UK pension is paid on such contributions.

A UK pension based entirely on National Insurance contributions is not affected if a person goes to live elsewhere in the EU. However, UK State Pension can be based wholly or partly on residence in Australia, Canada or New Zealand under the UK's Social Security agreements with those three countries. They have residence-based pensions which are not always payable if a person comes to live in the UK. If they go to live elsewhere the amount of pension derived from the agreement is no longer paid.

There are no plans to change the provisions of these arrangements.

Reliable estimates are not available of the cost of paying any UK pension derived from residence in Australia, Canada or New Zealand to pensioners who cease to be ordinarily resident in the UK.

Some 9,000 pensioners in the UK receive State Pensions based wholly or partly on residence in Canada.

Some 24,000 pensioners in the UK receive State Pensions based wholly or partly on residence in Australia or New Zealand.

Disability Living Allowance

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if section 10 of the Social Security Act 1998 and Regulation 7(c)(ii) of the Social Security (Decision and Appeals) Regulations 1999, which allows supersession at a later date of an original decision to award Disability Living Allowance when it is believed there has been a change of circumstance, can be applied following an appeal tribunal decision that has found in favour of the claimant using the same evidence available for the same period of time. [105175]

Angela Eagle: Yes.

The Secretary of State is empowered by section 10 of the Social Security Act 1998 and regulation 6 of the Social Security and Child Support (Decisions and Appeals) Regulation 1999 to supersede both his own decisions and those of appeal tribunals. Regulation 7(2)(c)(ii) allows, for instance in Disability Living Allowance, a superseding decision to be effective from the date the Secretary of State is satisfied a disadvantageous change of circumstances took place.

Where a tribunal finds in favour of an appellant, but in doing so does not (or is unable to) consider the available evidence, the Secretary of State may subsequently supersede on the basis of that same evidence There is, of course, a further right of appeal against this new decision.

State Pension

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of raising the basic State Pension (a) to the level of income support, (b) by £5 per week, and (c) by £10 per week. [106516]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table:

Estimated cost of raising the basic State Pension, including linked benefits for 2000–01

4. Means-tested benefit offsets have been estimated using the Income Support Simulation Model and the Policy Simulation Model.
5. Estimates are in 1999–2000 prices and are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of introducing a top up on the basic state pension of (a) £3 at age 75 years and £5 at age 80 years and (b) £5 at age 75 years and £10 at age 80 years. [106518]

Habitual Residence Test

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what criteria are used to determine whether individuals are habitually resident in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [106166]

Mr. Bayley: The purpose of the habitual residence test is to ensure that the income related benefits are paid to people with reasonably close ties to the United Kingdom and an intention to settle here. Each case is considered on its own merits. Guidance to decision makers and caselaw stresses the need to consider a wide range of factors, including the reason for a person coming (or returning) to the United Kingdom, the length of their stay, a settled intention to reside and any previous links with the country. The weight given to each factor will depend upon the individual's circumstances. Guidance to decision makers is contained in the Decision Makers Guide Volume 2 at paragraph 070719.

Correspondence

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will reply to the letter of 22 September 1999 from the hon. and learned Member for Harborough to the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), on behalf of the estate of Mr. A. J. H. Boulter of Wigston, Leicestershire. [105983]

Angela Eagle: A reply was sent to the hon. and learned Member on 24 January.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the bodies consulted on the design of the proposed ramped area from the external road to the olympic track of the English National Stadium Project; and if he will make a statement. [102391]

Kate Hoey: The design of the ramp area was a matter for Wembley National Stadium Ltd. (WNSL) as part of its overall brief for the design of the stadium.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on what basis he seeks to recover moneys from the Lottery award for the development of the English National Stadium at Wembley. [104327]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: Sport England, the Football Association and WNSL are currently considering whether amendments are necessary to the existing Lottery Funding Agreement to reflect Wembley's new role as the centrepiece for football and rugby league in England. In the light of the prospective agreement, the Football Association has proposed that £20 million be returned to Sport England.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the additional costs of building the new Wembley Stadium in athletics mode with a capacity of 80,000, rather than in football mode with a capacity of 90,000. [104326]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: I understand that although preliminary discussions took place between Wembley National Stadium, Sport England and UK Athletics about proposals to build the new stadium at Wembley in athletics mode with a capacity of 80,000, no estimates of additional costs were made.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of proposals to offset the costs of building the athletics platform at Wembley Stadium against the corporate hospitality rights owned by UK Athletics. [104338]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: The use of corporate hospitality rights at the new Wembley Stadium during an athletics event would be a matter for commercial negotiation between Wembley National Stadium Ltd. (WNSL) and the event organiser, UK Athletics. While preliminary discussions had taken place between WNSL and UK Athletics in which the Government did not take part, I understand that no firm agreements had been reached.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which condition of the Lottery Funding Agreement for the development of the English National Stadium at Wembley has been breached. [104328]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: The question of whether the conditions of a Lottery Funding Agreement have been breached are a matter for the Lottery distributor, in this case Sport England.

Olympic Games Stadium

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what (a) guidelines and (b) criteria the International Olympic Committee has notified him of regarding the minimum number of seats required for a stadium to host an Olympic Athletics competition; [104331]

(2) what (a) guidelines and (b) criteria the International Olympic Committee has notified him of regarding the minimum number of seats required for a stadium to host the opening and closing ceremonies of an Olympic Games. [104332]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: The International Olympic Committee has not notified the Department directly of guidelines or criteria for the minimum number of seats required for a stadium to host an Olympic athletics competition. The BOA have indicated that a viable UK bid would require an 80,000 seat stadium.

Sports Tourism Strategy

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the arrangements for ticket sales for sporting events in the United Kingdom following the launch of the British Tourist Authority sports tourism strategy. [105059]

Kate Hoey: The BTA's sports tourism strategy seeks to build on the capacity of these events to attract foreign visitors. The Sports Tourism Forum—established as part of the BTA strategy—will be examining the issue of ticket availability for tourists.

Swimming Pools

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps his Department is taking to ensure an equal geographical distribution of Olympic-size swimming pools in the United Kingdom. [105085]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Sport England have proposed a facilities plan for the provision of Olympic sized swimming pools, in association with the Amateur Swimming Association. In which the assessment of the most appropriate location and geographical coverage are central to decisions being made on final location. Sport England ensure that the key factors needed to sustain a pool of Olympic size are taken into account, including: a critical mass of population to sustain its use; whether the configuration of the pool to Olympic scale best meets the needs for the local population; and the location and needs of high performance swimmers.

There are currently 11 50m pools in England (including two under construction). Sport England have given in principal Lottery support to proposals for a new 50m pool in Loughborough. Sport England's facilities plan identifies the need for new 50m pools in the North East, Merseyside, Birmingham, Portsmouth, London and Leeds. The demand for a high performance swimming centre at Sheffield is also under consideration.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105806]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department actively encourages a reduction in smoking by operating a policy which permits smoking in only three designated smoking rooms. Ventilation in these rooms is designed to avoid the recirculation of smoke to non-smoking areas. In order to raise general awareness of health issues, my Department has introduced a computerised health checkpoint. This is accessible to all staff and includes information and advice on the risks associated with smoking. Staff have access to an on-site fitness centre and are given a full fitness assessment and advice on healthy living prior to joining. DCMS has also actively encouraged staff to participate in National No Smoking Day and will be doing so again this year.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub post offices. [105853]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 520W.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list those properties held by his Department and agencies responsible to him which are (a) wholly and (b) mainly unoccupied at present, giving locations and when they became so unoccupied in each case. [105303]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 19 January 2000]: My Department has the following properties unoccupied at present:

The remainder of the Royal Parks properties are available for re-occupation at any time.

Television Subtitles

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what arrangements he has made for public consultation regarding his Department's review of digital television subtitling targets; [105985]

(2) what the timescale is for his Department's review of digital television subtitling targets; and when he expects the review to be completed; [105984]

(3) if his Department's review of television subtitling targets will include analogue television; [105987]

(4) if he will publish the findings of his Department's review of digital television subtitling targets when it is completed. [105986]

Janet Anderson: The Government's review of the statutory targets on the subtitling, signing and audio description of programmes on digital terrestrial television will begin in early summer this year. We will be consulting the Independent Television Commission, the broadcasters, those who provide subtitling, signing and audio description services and consumer groups representing viewers with sensory disabilities. Once the review is completed in November 2000, we will publish the results.

The review will not include analogue television to which different arrangements apply. The Broadcasting Act 1990 set a target of 50 per cent. of subtitling of programmes by 1998 (for Channel 3) and by the fifth anniversary of its launch (for Channel 5). Thereafter it is for the Independent Television Commission (ITC) to set targets which are reasonably practicable. The Commission has set a target of 80 per cent. of subtitling of programmes by 2004 for Channel 3 and it will review this target in 2001.

National Lottery

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list in descending order of value (a) the number and type of National Lottery grants awarded to organisations in each constituency and (b) the total value of all National Lottery grants made to organisations in each constituency. [105898]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 20 January 2000]: I have placed the following tables in the Libraries of the House: (a) the total number of Lottery awards to each constituency broken down by good cause and (b) the total value of grants awarded to each constituency broken down by good cause, both shown in descending order.

The data have been taken from the National Lottery Awards Database which has been compiled using information on National Lottery awards supplied by the Distributing Bodies. The tables exclude Lottery awards not attributed by the Distributing Bodies to a particular constituency. The constituency information relates to the address to which the Lottery Award was sent.

Television Licences (Pensioners)

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) when the Government plan to introduce free television licences for pensioners over the age of 75 years; [106551]

(2) what mechanism the Government intend to put in place to ensure that (a) pensioners aged over 75 years who have previously purchased a television licence are reimbursed for the months still to run after they become eligible for a free licence and (b) pensioners who have purchased a television licence less than a year before turning 75 are reimbursed for the months still to run. [106552]

Janet Anderson: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his pre-Budget statement on 9 November 1999, Official Report, columns 883–91, that people aged 75 or over will receive their television licence free of charge from this autumn. The Government intend to announce shortly the precise starting date and details of how the scheme will operate. We anticipate that the scheme will incorporate arrangements for refunds in respect of unexpired licences.

Running Tracks

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many local authority running tracks there are in Essex. [106468]

Kate Hoey: There are six local authority running tracks in Essex.

Tourist Attractions (North-West)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions he has had with train and coach operators about promoting tourist attractions in the North-West. [105047]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 17 January 2000]: I have had no recent discussions with train and coach operators in the North West. However, I have started a regular dialogue with rail and coach operators at a national level through the English Tourism Council's Transport Task Force. This was set up recently as part of the Government's national strategy for tourism, Tomorrow's Tourism.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Hague Convention

Ms Oona King: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many children have been returned from (a) Greece to England and Wales and (b) England and Wales to Greece under the Hague Convention since the United Kingdom's accession to the Convention. [105847]

Jane Kennedy: The 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction came into force between the United Kingdom and Greece in 1993. From 1993 to the end of 1999 there were 25 cases of abduction from England and Wales to Greece with 11 returns (44 per cent. of applications made) and 48 cases of abduction to England and Wales with 22 returns (46 per cent. of applications received. Cases may involve more than one child.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the next international review by member state signatories of the Hague Convention on child abduction will take place; and if he will press for common procedures to be enforced in signatory countries. [105845]

Jane Kennedy: The next Special Commission of the Hague Conference to review the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction will be held in the spring of 2001. Contracting states of the Hague Convention have committed themselves to operate the provisions of the Convention and to do so in accordance with the terms under which it has been incorporated into their national law. The Government recognise that the operation of international conventions involves the alignment of different jurisdictions and different traditions of law and society.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many children have been abducted to each of the signatory states of the Hague Convention since the United Kingdom's accession; and what proportion of such children has been returned by each of those states. [105846]

Jane Kennedy: Figures for the number of cases of abduction from England and Wales dealt with under the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction since the Convention came into force between the United Kingdom and each contracting state, and the percentage of returns, are set out in the table. Cases may involve more than one child. Cases may be resolved satisfactorily between the parents otherwise than by a return.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105860]

Jane Kennedy: I refer the right hon. Member to the written answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 519W.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105868]

Jane Kennedy: I refer the right hon. Member to the written answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

HEALTH

Gammahydroxybutyrate

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to ban the sale and possession of the sedative drug, Gammahydroxybutyrate. [105612]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

The sale of Gammahydroxybutyrate (GHB) is governed by the Medicines Act 1968 and prohibited except under licence. GHB is not currently controlled under international drugs conventions or the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, and so possession does not constitute an offence.

The Government keep drug misuse under review and the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs has a statutory responsibility to advise the Government on such matters. The Council has considered the misuse of GHB on several occasions, most recently in May 1998. It decided against recommending that GHB be controlled under the Misuse of Drugs Act. At present, the World Health Organisation are looking at GHB and the European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction is considering its misuse within the European Union. The possible use of GHB in cases of drug rape is being considered within a Home Office sponsored Metropolitan Police research initiative into drug-assisted rape. The findings of these various pieces of research will be considered as part of the ongoing review process to which I have referred.

Thrombolytic Drugs

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of heart attack patients receive thrombolytic drugs within the target time of 30 minutes proposed by his Department. [99988]

Yvette Cooper: The Emerging Findings report on the National Service Framework for Coronary Heart Disease, published in November 1998, proposes a national standard for 'call-to-needle time' of 60 minutes for thrombolysis. This covers the total National Health Service response time from the point when the patient seeks professional help to the time when treatment is started if it is indicated.

There is no national audit of thrombolytic therapy in place at present. An audit undertaken in 15 hospitals in 1997, the latest year for which data are available, found that 14 per cent. of eligible patients received thrombolytic therapy within 60 minutes of calling for help, and the proportion treated within 30 minutes of hospital arrival ('door-to-needle' time) was 33.2 per cent.

Food Hygiene

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will require local authorities to publish their inspection reports on food outlets. [100496]

Yvette Cooper: Decisions on publication of information in respect of food inspections are a matter for individual local authorities in the light of local circumstances, taking into account the need to protect public health.

In-vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monitoring is carried out to ensure that IVF treatment is available in the North Essex Health Authority Area. [100900]

Yvette Cooper: No specific monitoring is carried out to ensure that in-vitro fertilisation treatment is available in the North Essex Health Authority area.

The decision to provide in-vitro fertilisation treatment is one for individual health authorities. This decision should be taken in the light of local needs, available resources and clinical effectiveness.

Malnutrition

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were classified as suffering from malnutrition in (a) 1970, (b) 1980, (c) 1990 and (d) 1998. [101372]

Yvette Cooper: The number of admissions to National Health Service hospitals in England with a diagnosis of malnutrition was 3,581 for the financial year 1989–90 and 6,293 for the financial year 1997–98. Figures are not available on a comparable basis for the earlier years.

Research studies have shown that 40 per cent. of adults patients and 15 per cent. of children are malnourished on admission to hospital, indicating that prevalence in the general population may be higher than the admissions figures suggest.

The Government's National Diet and Nutrition Survey programme monitors the diet and nutritional status of the population of Great Britain and has shown that while most people are adequately nourished, there has been a persistent rise in obesity. In 1997, the Health Survey for England showed that 17 per cent. of men and 20 per cent. of women in England were obese compared to 6 per cent. and 8 per cent. of those studied in the earliest previous study in 1980.

Breast Feeding

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent steps his Department has taken to promote breast feeding. [104093]

Yvette Cooper: We are fully committed to the promotion of breastfeeding, which is uniformly accepted as the best form of nutrition for infants. We also firmly believe that it is important that women and their partners are able to make a fully informed choice on how to feed their babies based on accurate and consistent information. This means that women should have access to information about all infant feeding practices through the relevant health care professional.

Two part-time infant feeding advisers have been appointed. One is a practising health visitor and the other a midwife to act as a focus for developing and implementing strategies for promoting breastfeeding. In particular, their expertise will be utilised to increase the incidence of breastfeeding among groups where breastfeeding rates are lowest, for example, those on low income, and to ensure that all mothers have the information and support they need to make informed infant feeding choices.

The infant feeding advisers are also managing a substantial project budget that will include taking forward developmental work on a model questionnaire for collecting information locally on monitoring breastfeeding rates, administer a small grant scheme to help evaluate projects which provide best practice on increasing breastfeeding rates among mothers on low incomes, take forward initiatives on a parent friendly approach to infant feeding and develop educational resources and promotional materials to promote breastfeeding that would appeal to varying groups in the population.

We also promote breastfeeding in the following ways. The National Network of Breastfeeding Co-ordinators has been established to promote breastfeeding at a local level and to share ideas nationally with a view to increasing both the number of mothers breastfeeding and the length of time they continue to breastfeed. Each year the four UK Health Departments support National Breastfeeding Awareness Week to increase public awareness of the benefits of breastfeeding, which will this year take place between 14–20 May.

The Department provides financial support to the four main voluntary organisations in this area, the National Childbirth Trust, La Leche League, Breastfeeding Network and the Association of Breastfeeding Mothers. Close links are also kept with UNICEF's Baby Friendly Initiative (BFI) which includes a Departmental observer sitting on the Steering Committee of the UK BFI. The Department offers support for research into breastfeeding through the Quinquennial Surveys of Infant Feeding Practice; a new survey will be undertaken this year. The Department also receives and publishes expert advice on breastfeeding through its advisory committees, such as COMA's Panel on Child and Maternal Nutrition.

Also, as part of the Department's research initiative on health inequalities, we are supporting a study aimed at identifying the barriers to breastfeeding in low income groups. This should also help us to understand what influences a woman's decision whether to breastfeed or not. In turn, this will help us to develop and test new policies to promote and improve the health of babies from low income families. This research will report in late 2001.

Employment Statistics

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) men and (b) women in each of the standard age groups were employed in his Department in (i) 1979 and (ii) 1999. [104030]

Yvette Cooper: In 1979 the Departments of Health and Social Security were a single department. The table shows the number of men and women employed by the DHSS in each of the standard age groups.

All ages	62,525	35,903	98,482

Drug Treatment

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health of the £50 million allocated to health authorities for drug treatment services; what priorities he has set out for this expenditure; and what is the total allocated to the North West Region. [104343]

Yvette Cooper: £1,314,000 has been allocated to health authorities in the North West for the financial year 1999–2000. This is from a total of £12 million allocated to health authorities for the development of new drug treatment services. Announcements on the allocation of funding in 2000–01 and 2001–02 for the development of new drug treatment services are yet to be made. Three priority areas have currently been identified: development of primary care based treatment services and support for drug misusers; an increase in the provision of treatment services for young people who misuse drugs, particularly the under-18s, and prevention services for vulnerable young people (among the under 25s); and implementation of a hepatitis B immunisation programme targeted at drug misusers most at risk of the infection.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health of the £20 million allocated to local authorities for drug treatment services what priorities he has set out for their use; and what is the figure allocated to each local authority in the North West Region. [104344]

Yvette Cooper: The additional drug and alcohol specific grants and special grants allocated to local authorities in the north west for 1999–2000 are shown in the tables. This is from a total additional £3 million allocated to local authorities to develop new services and increase the numbers of problem drug misusers accessing services that have a positive impact on health and crime. It is expected that this will: improve access to services for substance misusers; support substance misusers, including people with a dual diagnosis, in overcoming their problems and helping them to lead healthier, crime free lives; and develop a co-ordinated and flexible service provision which will involve more extensive joint planning and commissioning.

Vaccinations

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost to the NHS of vaccinating persons prior to their travelling abroad in the last year for which figures are available. [104134]

Yvette Cooper: It is not possible to give a total figure for the cost of immunisation for the purpose of travel abroad each year. Records are not kept of the numbers of people immunised and data on prescription items are limited as they do not differentiate between vaccine given for travel or for other reasons and they do not differentiate between primary courses (usually consisting of several doses of vaccine) and booster doses. The number of prescription items dispensed in England and the net ingredient costs for vaccines that may be given for the purposes of travel are given in the table.

The number of prescription items dispensed and net ingredient cost for vaccines likely to have been administered for travel [1]

[1] The travel vaccines are those preparations in the British National Formulary (BNF) (issue 38, September 1999) section 14.6—International travel: BCG, diphtheria, hepatitis A, meningococcal A&C, normal immunoglobulin, poliomyelitis, typhoid, and yellow fever. Some of these vaccines will have been prescribed for reasons other than travel.

Notes:

1. The data cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England.

2. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does no include any dispensing costs or fees.

Infectious Diseases

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost to the NHS of treating patients in the UK for infectious diseases contracted in other countries in the last year for which figures are available. [104133]

Yvette Cooper: Information on the cost to the National Health Service from travel-related infection is not held centrally. Information on the numbers of all diseases notifiable under various Public Health (Infectious Diseases) Regulations in England and Wales are published in the Public Health Laboratory Service's Communicable Disease Statistics England and Wales. Where known, numbers of cases of diseases contracted abroad are given, but this information is not reliably reported. Copies are available in the Library.

Lung Cancer

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in the last year for which figures are available, how many people in each NHS region who are receiving palliative chemotherapy to relieve the symptoms of inoperable non-small lung cancer are aged (a) under 29, (b) 30 to 49, (c) 50 to 64, (d) 65 to 74, (e) 75 to 84 and (f) 85 years and over. [103950]

Yvette Cooper: Information on the number of people in each NHS region receiving palliative chemotherapy for inoperable non-small cell lung cancer by age group is not available.

Evidence based guidance "Improving Outcomes in Lung Cancer" published in June 1998 has been sent to all commissioners and providers of lung cancer services and concentrates on those aspects of services which are likely to have a significant impact on health outcomes. The guidance is intended to support the ongoing implementation of the Calman/Hine report. The guidance makes it clear that palliative care should be an integral part of patient management for all lung cancer patients from the outset, including chemotherapy where appropriate.

Neurology Treatment

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his target for the maximum waiting time to see a consultant neurologist; what is the current waiting period for Essex Rivers Healthcare NHS Trust; and if he will make a statement. [104506]

Mr. Denham: There is no specific target for individual specialities. Over a third of all patients have their first outpatient appointment within 4 weeks of being referred by their general practitioner. We are, however, determined to modernise services and reduce the number of patients waiting longer than thirteen weeks for their first outpatient appointment.

Figures are not collected on the average waiting period of patients for a first outpatient appointment but figures are available on the length of time patients waited to be seen following a GP written referral. The latest figures available are for Quarter 2 (quarter ending 30 September 1999), and are given in the table.

Heart Disease

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of deaths per year (a) in total and (b) of heart patients which would be avoided if those diagnosed with heart disease were legally required to comply with prescribed medical treatment; [104763]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of deaths per year (a) in total and (b) of diabetics which would be avoided if those with a diagnosis of heart disease were legally required to comply with prescribed medical treatment. [104762]

Mr. Denham: No such estimates have been made.

Diabetics

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of insulin-dependent diabetics failed to comply with medically prescribed treatment in the last year for which figures are available. [104761]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

NHS Litigation Authority

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average delay in reimbursement by the NHS Litigation Authority in the last 12 months; and how much is owed to each health authority. [105504]

Mr. Denham: The average time taken to reimburse health authorities and National Health Service trusts during this period was 1.8 months. However, the most recent figures indicate that the NHS Litigation Authority is currently meeting its target of dealing with cases within 30 days of receiving a correctly completed payment request form. It is not possible to state how much is owed to each health authority since this will change on a day-to-day basis.

Babies (Heroin Addiction)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many babies born in each health authority area in England in each of the last five years have been dependent at birth upon heroin or heroin substitutes. [105256]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is not available centrally.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to control the cost and availability of generic drugs. [105508]

Ms Stuart: We are determined to ensure that the supply of generic medicines to the National Health Service is reliable and delivers value for money. We have put in place a fundamental review of the generic medicines market to consider how we can best achieve these and related objectives. The review is under way and conclusions are expected in the summer.

Morphine and Diamorphine

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much (a) morphine and (b) diamorphine by (i) weight and (ii) cost the NHS has purchased in each of the last 10 years. [105354]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is shown in the tables.

Notes:
Please note that the data up to 1990 are not strictly consistent with data from 1991 onwards. Figures for 1989 and 1990 are based on fees and on a sample of 1 in 200 prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors only. Figures for 1991 onwards are based on items and cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists, appliance contractors, dispensing doctors and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered.
The net ingredient cost is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.

Intensive Care Beds

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) intensive care beds and (b) high dependency beds there were within the NHS in each of the last 30 years. [105676]

Mr. Denham: Available information is the average daily number of available and occupied beds by ward type for each National Health Service trust. This is published annually in "Bed Availability and Occupancy, England" and is available in the Library. However, this was an intensive care ward-based count. As wards classified as intensive care can also contain other types of beds, we have piloted a new census focusing specifically on adult intensive care and high dependency beds. We will publish the results in due course.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many additional intensive care beds were created in each NHS trust hospital during 1999; and how many were withdrawn from use in that year. [106204]

Mr. Denham: Information is not available in the form requested. However, we introduced on 31 March 1999 the first of a twice yearly census of intensive care and high dependency beds. A further census was taken on 30 September 1999. We will publish the results in due course.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will (1) list the number of intensive care beds opened at each hospital since 1 May 1997, giving the date of opening in each case; [106176]

(2) list the number of intensive care beds at each hospital that have been closed since 1 May 1997, giving the date of closure in each case. [105893]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally. Available information is the average daily number of available beds by ward type for each National Health Service trust. This is published annually in "Bed Availability and Occupancy, England" and copies are in the Library. However, this is a ward-based count and as wards classified as intensive care can also contain other beds, we have piloted a new twice yearly census focusing specifically on adult intensive care and high dependency beds. We will publish the results in due course.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for further action to restrain the use of anonymised data extracted from prescription forms; and if he will make a statement on the ownership of the data contained in prescription forms. [106061]

Ms Stuart: There has recently been a judgment in the Court of Appeal dealing with the use that can be made of anonymised data extracted from prescription forms. I have arranged for a Petition for leave to appeal to be lodged at the judicial office of the House of Lords. We shall also continue to consider the complex legal issues raised by the judgment, and, in particular, the implications for the use of data on prescription forms.

Accident and Emergency Departments (West Midlands)

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many 24 hour accident and emergency departments there were in the West Midlands region on (a) 31 December 1970 and (b) 31 December 1999. [105989]

Ms Stuart: On 31 December 1999 there were 21 24-hour accident and emergency departments in the West Midlands region.

The figure for 31 December 1970 is not available. Changes in the configuration of health services and in the definition of what constitutes an accident and emergency department have altered significantly over the last 30 years.

Diseases

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the likely change over the next 10 years in the incidence of cases of (a) MRSA, (b) TB and (c) Hepatitis C; and what action is he taking to deal with such changes. [105424]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 20 January 2000]: MRSA is the antibiotic resistant form of Staphylococcus aureus, a bacterium which is carried harmlessly on the skin by at least a third of the population. About 80 per cent. of people who acquire MRSA similarly carry it harmlessly on the skin and do not suffer from any infection. Action is in hand to improve the surveillance of MRSA and also the prevention and control of hospital acquired infection, including MRSA. The extent to which this work will impact on the cases of incidence over the next 10 years is unpredictable.

Official notifications of tuberculosis gradually fell to an all time low of 5,086 in England and Wales in 1987 from about 50,000 cases a year in the 1950s. Since the early 1990s there have been overall small year on year increases in total notified cases which are continuing. Provisional notifications for 1998 were just over 6,000. While some of this may be due to better ascertainment of cases, it has occurred against the backdrop of a worldwide resurgence of this disease that will, inevitably, continue to have some impact on tuberculosis in the United Kingdom through travel and immigration.

We are working to minimise the effect of worldwide developments and have taken steps to strengthen the surveillance, prevention and control of tuberculosis, including drug resistant tuberculosis.

The incidence of hepatitis C infection is not known as the virus is usually acquired without symptoms. Currently, the most frequent route of transmission of hepatitis C is through sharing of blood-contaminated equipment by injecting drug misusers. Preliminary evidence suggests that the prevalence of hepatitis C infection in newer injectors may be lower than in the past. We are continuing to promote harm minimisation measures to try to accelerate any downward trend.

However, there is likely to be an increase in the diagnosis of hepatitis C in the next 10 years as individuals who have carried the virus for some time are identified through wider testing of groups who have been at risk. Improved treatments are becoming available to help prevent progression to serious liver disease.

National Radiological Protection Board

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will (a) give the annual budget of the National Radiological Protection Board during each of the last three years and (b) list the source and amount of every payment to the board which exceeded five per cent. of its income in any one year. [105583]

Yvette Cooper: The annual budget of the National Radiological Protection Board during each of the last three years was:

	£ million
1996–97	15.2
1997–98	14.6
1998–99	13.7

Dentistry

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the reasons for the declining number of registrations with NHS dentists; and if he will make a statement. [104722]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The decline in the recorded number of registrations since December 1993 is due to a variety of reasons, including improved systems which remove duplicate registrations, the change in the adult registration period from 24 to 15 months, and some dentists withdrawing from the General Dental Service or reducing their level of commitment to the National Health Service. There will also be some patients who may choose not to register with a dentist, but seek dental treatment only when a problem occurs. The establishment of Dental Access Centres in various parts of the country, announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last September, will enable people not registered with a dentist but who want to see one, to access high quality NHS care. The Government are committed to ensuring that, within two years, anyone wanting to see a NHS dentist would be able to do so by ringing NHS Direct.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the White Paper on NHS Dentistry. [106721]

Mr. Hutton: The National Health Service dental strategy will be published shortly.

Hospital Waiting Lists (Mid-Essex)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply of 13 January 2000, Official Report, columns 233–34W, on the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust, how many people in the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust area were waiting 12 months or more for treatment on the latest date for which information is available; and what has been the total number of patients waiting for hospital treatment in the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust area for the last two months for which figures are available. [106033]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is given in the table.

Total number of patients waiting and the number of patients waiting over 12 months for hospital treatment in the Mid-Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust in October and November 1999

Month	Total waiting	Number waiting over 12 months
October	9,372	1,024
November	9,483	1,042

Source:
Monthly Waiting List Returns

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 234W, how many people in the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust area were, on 30 November 1999, waiting over 18 months for treatment, and for how long over 18 months each such patient was waiting; for what reasons such patients were waiting for more than 18 months; and if all these patients have now been treated. [106034]

Mr. Denham: We are committed to ensuring that no patient has to wait more than 18 months for treatment. However, the last published figures for waiting times, for November 1999, show that at the end of November 1999, 14 patients waited over 18 months for treatment at Mid-Essex Hospital Services National Health Services Trust.

Information about individual patients waiting over 18 months is not collected centrally.

Pay Settlement (North-West Lancashire)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the budget for the North West Lancashire Health Authority for 2000–01 to take account of the latest pay settlement for doctors and nurses. [106168]

Mr. Denham: The 2000–01 unified allocation for North West Lancashire Health Authority is £345.28 million, which represents a cash increase of £21.95 million (6.79 per cent.).

The overall allocation will help fund the increased pay bill and other costs, such as health improvement programmes and reducing waiting lists. However, it is for health authorities, in partnership with National Health Service trusts, primary care groups, local authorities and the local stakeholders, to determine how best to use their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health and modernising services. The significant additional resources available will aid them in this process.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress of the PFI project for the New Lymington Community Hospital. [105585]

Mr. Denham: Negotiations between Southampton Community Health Services National Health Service Trust and its private sector partner on the proposed private finance initiative scheme for a new community hospital for Lymington are continuing.

Hearing Aids

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason he has introduced digital hearing aids on a pilot basis; and when he plans to extend their availability nationally. [106122]

Mr. Hutton: In order to introduce digital hearing aid technology into the National Health Service, hearing aid departments will need new equipment, professionals will need different skills and revised procedures will be required to prescribe digital hearing aids to patients. Such changes will need to be introduced in an integrated way. The pilots will last for two years, after which we will make decisions about extending their availability nationally.

TREASURY

House Repossessions (Income Support)

Mr. White: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with mortgage companies about repossessions caused by a shortfall between payments that income support cover and actual interest due. [105600]

Mr. Bayley: I have been asked to reply.

None. Income Support cover is calculated using a standard interest rate which is based on the weighted average of basic rates charged by the main building societies. It should be noted that the standard interest rate is an average and there is not always a shortfall between Income Support cover and actual interest due.

Deregulation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what orders his Department has made under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 in each year since 1994; and what plans it has to introduce such orders. [106086]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The following orders have been made by Treasury Ministers:

The Deregulation (Building Societies) Order 1995 (SI no. 1995/3233).

The Deregulation (Friendly Societies Act 1992) Order 1996 (SI no. 1996/1188).

The Deregulation (Credit Unions) Order 1996 (SI no. 1996/1189).

The Deregulation (Industrial and Provident Societies) Order 1996 (SI no. 1996/1738).

Debt Relief

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what authority will be responsible for assessing the effect of bilateral debt relief on the heavily indebted poor countries; [105737]

(2) who will assess the implementation of health and education programmes carried out following the cancellation of bilateral debt. [105736]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Government are satisfied that the conditions of debt relief applied under HIPC are sufficient to guarantee that moneys freed up will be spent on social programmes and poverty reduction. The revised HIPC framework not only provides faster, wider and deeper debt relief, it also increases the impact which this relief has on poverty, through the development and implementation of national Poverty Reduction Strategies, the implementation of which will be an essential pre-condition of qualification for HIPC debt relief.

The transformation of the IMF's Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility into the Poverty Reduction and Growth Facility means that the Poverty Reduction Strategy will become the key instrument in the country's relations with the donor community. In the context of lending operations and assistance strategies, the Boards of the IMF and World bank will be asked to endorse the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper. The Strategy will therefore provide the basis for IMF and World bank concessional lending to HIPC countries in the future, as well as for debt relief now.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the amount that each of the heavily indebted poor countries will save in debt service as a result of the decision to cancel bilateral debt. [105825]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The specific amount of extra debt relief that a country will receive in any one year cannot be known until the amounts and way in which their multilateral HIPC debt relief will be given is known—in particular, the effect of any debt rescheduling of official bilateral creditors agreed by the Paris Club. This is why the Government is working with the International Financial Institutions to ensure that countries come forward for multilateral relief as soon as is possible.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which departmental budget will cover the cost of the cancellation of ECGD debt to the heavily indebted poor countries. [105829]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Department for International Development will make grant payments to the countries in question to meet the remaining debt service obligations to ECGD after multilateral HIPC debt relief. These grant payments will be made from resources which are additional to the current aid budget.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he estimates that each of the heavily indebted poor countries will benefit from the bilateral debt relief programme. [105747]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The UK's extra bilateral debt relief is dependent on countries first qualifying for multilateral debt relief under the HIPC initiative.

The G7 remains committed to its target of working with the International Financial Institutions to ensure that three-quarters of eligible countries reach their decision point by the end of the year and the remainder embark on the process as soon as possible thereafter.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost of the reduction of debt owed by heavily indebted poor countries to the UK over each of the next 25 years; what is the value of the debt written off at current prices; and what part of the debt was counted as an asset by the Treasury for accounting purposes. [105837]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The costs of reduction of debt by the heavily indebted poor countries will be divided between those amounts due to the relief provided under traditional multilateral debt mechanisms i.e. due to the UK's participation in the HIPC initiative and those amounts due to the extra bilateral relief that the UK is providing in order to relieve 100 per cent. of the debt burden of these countries. The current value of the total amount of debt owed to ECGD by the heavily indebted poor countries is approximately £1.9 billion.

The cost of the debt reduction in any one year will depend on the number of countries who are eligible for relief, the amount of debt relief required to bring their debt stock to a sustainable level as defined by the terms of the enhanced HIPC initiative and the terms of their Paris Club debt rescheduling agreement.

All debt held by ECGD is recorded in their own Accounts, which are managed on a commercial basis and separate from the Government's own accounts. The costs of debt cancellation due to the UK's participation in the multilateral HIPC initiative will fall to ECGD and will be recorded in their Accounts as an amount deducted from Recoverable Claims.

The costs of providing the extra bilateral relief over and above the amounts due to the UK's participation in the HIPC initiative will be met by the Department for International Development from resources additional to the existing aid budget. The Government estimate, though, that, subject to assumptions about the period over which countries become eligible for relief and the amount of relief they receive under the multilateral HIPC initiative, the costs of providing the extra bilateral relief will be £640 million over the 25 year period.

Friendly Societies

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many industrial and provident societies are registered with the Registry of Friendly Societies; and what proportion of these have an annual turnover of less than (a) £10,000 and (b) £5,000; [105897]

(2) what representations he has received in the last two years regarding fees payable to the Registry of Friendly Societies by industrial and provident societies; and if he will make a statement. [105896]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 20 January 2000]: 8,892 industrial and provident societies (I&Ps) are registered with the Registry of Friendly Societies (RFS). Based on the latest returns received, 992 and 739 have turnover less than £10,000 and £5,000 respectively. The Treasury receives occasional representations on fees payable by I&Ps to the RFS. Those fees are reviewed every year.

VAT

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to allow the National Crime Squad and the National Criminal Intelligence Service to reclaim value added tax paid on their normal policing activities. [106532]

Dawn Primarolo: No. VAT incurred by police authorities in the course of their normal policing activities can be recovered under section 33 of the VAT Act 1994. The National Crime Squad and National Criminal Intelligence Service are not police authorities and they are not eligible to recover VAT under the terms of this provision.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to continue to exempt from value added tax (a) finance and insurance and (b) betting, gaming and lotteries; and if he will make a statement. [106637]

Mr. Timms: Yes. EC law requires member states to exempt these services.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to maintain zero-rating for value added tax purposes on (a) construction of new dwellings, (b) books, newspapers and magazines and (c) international passenger transport; and if he will make a statement. [106636]

Dawn Primarolo: We have no current plans to remove these zero-rates. Any changes to VAT coverage would be for the Chancellor to decide in the next Budget.

Personal Allowances

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue yield in the (a) first year and (b) a full year from abolishing the age related personal allowances and replacing them with the standard personal allowance at the existing level. [106509]

Dawn Primarolo: The yield from replacing the age-related personal allowances with the standard personal allowances in 2000–01 is around £0.95 billion in a full year and £0.8 billion in the first year on a National Accounts Basis. These estimates are based on the 1997–98 Survey of Personal incomes and consistent with the November 1999 Pre-Budget Report forecast.

Income Tax

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) full year and (b) first year revenues which would be raised by increasing the basic rate of tax by one penny in the pound. [106510]

Dawn Primarolo: The latest estimate for changing the basic rate of income tax was published by HM Treasury in table 4 of the "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs" in November 1999, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of abolishing the 10 per cent. income tax band and extending the size of the personal tax allowance by the size of this band. [106511]

Dawn Primarolo: The cost of abolishing the starting rate of income tax and increasing the personal allowances by £1,520 in 2000–01 would be £4 billion in a full year. This estimate is based on the 1997–98 Survey of Personal incomes and consistent with the November 1999 Pre-Budget Report forecast.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of increasing the size of the basic rate income tax band by £2,000 per year, assuming no change in the size of the personal allowance or lower rate band. [106505]

Dawn Primarolo: The full-year cost of increasing the basic rate limit by £2,000 in 2000–01 is £0.9 billion. This estimate is based on the 1997–98 Survey of Personal incomes and consistent with the November 1999 Pre-Budget Report forecast.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) first year and (b) full year revenue yield from introducing a 50 per cent. income tax rate on taxable income of over £100,000 per annum; and how this yield would increase in each of the following two years. [106512]

Dawn Primarolo: The full-year yields from introducing a 50 per cent. income tax rate on taxable income over £100,000 per annum are £2.6 billion in 2000–01, £2.9 billion in 2001–02 and £3.1 billion in 2002–03. The first year yield on a National Accounts Basis is £1.7 billion. These estimates are based on the 1997–98 Survey of Personal incomes and consistent with the November 1999 Pre-Budget Report forecast.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to hold a referendum on entry to the euro within the lifetime of the next Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [106465]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Government policy towards holding a referendum on the single currency remains as set out by the Chancellor in his statement to the House of Commons on 27 October 1997.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost to date of the National Changeover Plan. [106388]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) on 13 December 1999, Official Report, column 78W.

Law Students (Vocational Training Relief)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to ensure that students required to undertake a fourth year at law school after taking their first degree will continue to be eligible for Vocational Training Relief after September 2000. [106044]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chancellor announced in the March 1999 Budget that Vocational Training Relief (VTR) will be withdrawn when the national framework for Individual Learning Accounts (ILAs) is launched, under which people who open ILAs will be eligible for discounts towards the cost of approved types of learning. In last November's pre-Budget Report we said that, on current plans, the discounts will first become available from September this year and that accordingly VTR is to be withdrawn at the end of August.

On that basis, VTR will not be due for training payments made on or after 1 September 2000. Students undertaking training which currently qualifies for VTR and continues after September 2000 will, however, be eligible for VTR if they pay the remaining course fees before the end of August 2000.

Armed Forces Commitment

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many days total commitment of HM armed forces the reserves can maintain; if holding these reserves as (a) foreign exchange and (b) bullion modifies commitment capability; and if he will make a statement. [106402]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The costs of committing the armed forces depend on many factors, and do not necessarily require use of the Government's reserves.

Bilateral Financial Assistance

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total of financial assistance given by Her Majesty's Government to (a) Sub-Sahara Africa and (b) the former Yugoslavia in the last financial year. [106194]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Figures for bilateral financial assistance given by HMG are published in the Department for International Development Report "Statistics on International Development". For financial year 1998–99, the total bilateral financial assistance given by HMG to:

(a) Sub-Sahara Africa was just over £560 million.

(b) The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) was £4.5 million (the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was promulgated in April 1992 following the breakup of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (former Yugoslavia)).

The UK contributes indirectly to financial assistance in both areas as a member of the EU and in Sub-Sahara Africa as a shareholder in a range of international financial organisations. It is not possible to provide reliable statistics for this assistance in the financial year 1998–99.

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106290]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Transferable Tax Allowance

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to the Exchequer of providing a transferable tax allowance between (a) all married couples, (b) all married couples with children, (c) all families with children, (d) all married couples with children whose youngest child is under the age of five years, (e) all families with children whose youngest child is under the age of five years and (f) all families with caring responsibilities in receipt of invalid care allowance. [104868]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimated costs for 2000–01 of allowing married or co-habiting couples to transfer all or part of their personal allowance are given in the following table.

Family type	£ million
(a) All married couples	4,250
(b) All married couples with children	2,250
(c) All families[1] with children	2,500
(d) All married couples whose youngest child is under the age of five	1,750
(e) All families[1] whose youngest child is under the age of five	2,000
(f) All families[1] with caring responsibilities in receipt of invalid care allowance	70

[1] A family is defined here as unit with a married or co-habiting couple

Childcare Tax Credit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the steady-state cost of providing the childcare tax credit to all households with a child below the age of one year on the current tapers, irrespective of whether anyone is in work. [104865]

Dawn Primarolo: The childcare tax credit is available to families in receipt of the Working Families' Tax Credit or Disabled Person's Tax Credit who meet the work requirements and have eligible child care costs.

If a separate weekly credit of £70 were to be given to all families with a child under one, including those on income support or Jobseeker's Allowance, subject to a taper of 55 per cent. for net income over £90 per week, then the estimated cost for 2000–01 would be about £800 million.

Financial Services Authority

Mr. Efford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to ensure that the Financial Services Authority's single ombudsman service is sufficiently funded to protect the interests of consumers; and if he will make a statement. [106514]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Financial Services and Markets Bill, in paragraph 2 of Schedule 14, requires the Financial Services Authority to take such steps as are necessary to ensure that the operator of the Ombudsman scheme is capable of exercising the functions conferred by the Bill. The Bill also provides that funding should be provided by the industry. The FSA are in the process of consulting on the detailed arrangements of the Ombudsman Scheme.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the eligibility of companies to complain to the Financial Services Authority's single ombudsman service; and if he will make a statement. [106513]

Miss Melanie Johnson: While the Financial Services and Markets Bill sets the general framework for the ombudsman scheme, the detailed operation of the scheme will be determined in rules made by the Financial Services Authority. It will be open, as specified in Clause 201(7) of the Bill, to the Authority to define certain categories of firms as eligible complainants. The FSA is currently consulting on this matter and has proposed that firms should be eligible to use the scheme if they have a turnover of up to £1 million and no more than four staff.

Higher Rate Taxpayers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number and percentage of higher rate taxpayers in (a) each county in England and (b) each local authority area in (i) Scotland, (ii) Wales and (iii) Northern Ireland. [106745]

Dawn Primarolo: I regret that reliable estimates for the number of higher rate taxpayers are not available for each county in England, but they are available at Government Office Region level which are shown in the table:

Taxpayer numbers by region—1999–2000

Thousand

	Number of higher rate income taxpayers	Total number of income taxpayers
North East	60	1,000
North West and Merseyside	200	2,900
Yorkshire and the Humber	140	2,200
East Midlands	140	1,900
West Midlands	145	2,200
East of England	300	2,600
London	420	3,100
South East	515	3,900
South West	175	2,300
Wales	65	1,200
Scotland	170	2,400
Northern Ireland	35	600
Address abroad	15	100
All	2,400	26,600

These estimates are based on the 1997–98 Survey of Personal incomes and consistent with the November 1999 pre-Budget Report forecast.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105802]

Miss Melanie Johnson: HM Treasury has an established policy on smoking intended to strike a balance between the interests of smokers and of non-smokers. Smoking is largely restricted to dedicated ventilated smoking rooms and is not permitted in common areas, with the exception of an area of the staff restaurant.

Credit Unions

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans his Department has to encourage the growth of credit unions; and if he will make a statement. [105199]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I announced on 16 November 1999, a range of measures—increased flexibility, better regulation, and the establishment of a central services organisation—to encourage the growth of credit unions.

Revenue Losses

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the revenue lost to the Exchequer in each of the last three years. [105550]

Dawn Primarolo: Much of the revenue lost relates to the impact of the hidden economy. Estimates of revenue lost to the Exchequer due to the hidden economy are notoriously difficult to make. Although there have been attempts to do so, there is no reliable estimate available.

Financial Secretary (Shareholdings)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what advice the Financial Secretary received from the Permanent Secretary to HM Treasury regarding his shares declared in the Register of Members' Interests. [105433]

Mr. Gordon Brown: By long-standing convention, any advice which Ministers seek from civil servants is confidential and is not made public, as provided for under Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Efficiency Improvements

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures his Department has developed of efficiency improvements in delivering the Treasury's outputs over the three year Comprehensive Spending Review period. [105815]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Treasury monitors those outputs which can be measured, such as replies to Parliamentary questions, letters or other communications with the public, payment performance, and so on.

However the Treasury's primary output is policy advice. Such outputs are difficult to measure. Here, the Treasury has adopted a benchmarking approach, applying the European Foundation for Quality Management's business excellence model.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105876]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Treasury is responsible for the activities of the now-disbanded Private Finance Panel, so I will answer the right hon. Member's series of questions on this issue for the Government as a whole.

The information currently available is given in a table, a copy of which I am placing in the Library of the House.

Following disbandment of the Private Finance Panel and Executive, the Treasury Taskforce adopted a database designed only to cover those projects with a realistic change of being achieved through PFI.

The coverage of this database is therefore not identical to that of the 29 November 1995 table. In particular, the database cannot identify the anonymised projects referred to in that table, and the information sought could be obtained (if at all) only at disproportionate cost. In the case of DETR this is true of all projects.

What the present table clearly shows is the great progress made by this Government since 1 May 1997 in reinvigorating PFI. Of the 250+ signed PFI deals since 1986, only 70 were achieved in the seven years prior to the election. In the first two and a half years of this administration, we have broken the logjam and are delivering much needed, high quality, value for money public services.

National Insurance Records

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason the national insurance records of the hon. Member for Hereford's constituents Mr. John Farren and Mrs. Ann Farren are not up to date; and if he will make a statement. [106167]

Dawn Primarolo: It would be inappropriate to make publicly available personal information about the hon. Member's constituents, as provided for under Exclusion 12 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. I am, however, writing to the hon. Member about this matter.

Agricultural Workers (Suicide)

Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list by English county since 1995 (a) total suicides and (b) suicides among the agricultural workforce. [106181]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Robert Key, dated 24 January 2000:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question asking for total suicides by English counties since 1995 and suicides amongst the agricultural workforce.

The information requested is given in the attached tables.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the pesticides applied on the farm scale trial of genetically modified oilseed rape and conventional oilseed rape at Model Farm, near Watlington, in 1999, giving in each case (a) the name of the product used, (b) the rate of application and (c) the date or dates applied. [101757]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 9 December 1999]: Information on all the pesticides (including herbicides) used on both the genetically modified and the conventional crops being grown under the farm scale evaluation programme is recorded in detail by the research contractors as part of their monitoring of field sites. The full information will be passed to the independent scientific steering committee overseeing the farm scale evaluations, and will be published in their report of the evaluations, but is not currently available. Pesticide information will help establish the context of any observed differences in wildlife between the GM and conventional crops, and will be published alongside the results.

Korean Airlines Crash, Stansted

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment has been made (a) by his Department and (b) by the Air Accident Investigation Board, of the environmental implications of the dispersal of the depleted uranium ballast from the wings of the Korean Airlines aircraft which crashed at Stansted on 22 December 1999. [104703]

Mr. Mullin: I understand from the Environment Agency and the Air Accidents Investigation Board that the depleted uranium was part of the structure of the aircraft and was incorporated as solid weights in the tail section. Sixteen of the 20 weights have been recovered and none of these shows signs of damage such that dispersal would have occurred. A radiological survey of the crash site is being conducted and it is expected this will lead to the recovery of the others. The facts already established about the nature of the fire that occurred after the crash mean that it is extremely unlikely that any dispersal of the uranium will have taken place.

The aircraft was carrying a very small amount of radioactive material used for medical diagnosis. This was contained in 220 vials of iodine-125 bound for China. The quantity of material involved is too small to cause any damage to local people or the environment. This material is of such limited potential risk that it is not required to be notified to the pilot in command among the list of dangerous goods carried. The recovery of residual material from the accident site is in hand and its disposal is regulated by the Environment Agency.

Driving Licences

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the minimum age at which people can hold a driving licence. [104883]

Mr. Hill: The rules governing the age at which people can hold driving licences are set out in The Motor Vehicle (Driving Licences) Regulations 1999.

Measures to improve the safety record of new licence holders are being considered as part of the road safety strategy, which is to be published shortly.

Homeless People

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to issue guidance to local authorities in relation to providing services for homeless people with multiple needs. [104805]

Mr. Mullin: Following consultation last year, the Government propose to issue in the Spring a revised version of the Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (Parts VI and VII of the Housing Act 1996). This will include specific guidance encouraging housing authorities to work together with all relevant agencies to secure the effective delivery of appropriate support packages to homeless people with housing and other needs.

Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to fill the vacancies on the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee; and for how long these vacancies have existed. [105078]

Mr. Meacher: At the time of the last round of Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee appointments in November 1998, three positions, out of an agreed Committee complement of 20, were left unfilled. Candidates to fill two of these vacancies, under nuclear and radioactive waste management and health and safety membership template headings, were interviewed towards the end of last year. Appropriate appointments will be made in due course in conjunction with Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly Ministers.

Tourist Attractions

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what is the maximum distance a tourism site may be from a brown tourist attraction sign on a motorway; [105135]

(2) if he will increase the maximum distance a tourism site may be from its brown motorway sign. [105136]

Mr. Hill: Guidelines for signing on motorways in England specify that an attraction should be within 20 miles of the junction from which it is to be signed. Stricter criteria relating to driving time rather than distance apply on the M25 and roads within it. Signs not meeting the criteria may exceptionally be permitted if justified by special local circumstances.

Councillors

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what considerations underlie his policy of ensuring that local authority councillors receive a basic allowance. [105520]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Our policy, as set out in "Modern Local Government"—In Touch with the People" (Cm 4014), is that financial support for councillors must reinforce the culture of the modern council and address, as far as possible, any disincentives to serving in local politics. Basic allowance is intended to recognise the time commitment expected of all councillors, including such inevitable calls on their time as meetings with officers and attendance at political group meetings.

Council Housing

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many council houses were (a) sold and (b) built in each of the last 10 years in the London borough of Wandsworth. [105509]

Mr. Mullin: The available information reported by the London Borough of Wandsworth is in the table.

Number of council-owned dwellings sold and built in London Borough of Wandsworth

Year	Sales	New build completions
1989–90	2,262	0
1990–91	1,050	0
1991–92	840	0
1992–93	672	0
1993–94	674	1
1994–95	449	0
1995–96	248	0

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105803]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department seeks to create a non-smoking work environment. This is primarily through the creation of smoking rooms, or smoking areas where the size or configuration of the building does not make this feasible, although in some buildings staff have voted for a total ban on smoking. Health promotion activities have complemented this approach with displays, in-house magazine articles and proactive events. When lifestyle screening programmes are run an individual's smoking habits are one of the areas discussed with the screening nurse.

Cable Telecommunications

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will revise planning and development control legislation to bring cable communications development within the ambit of regulations governing radio installations; and if he will make a statement; [105664]

(2) if he will make a statement on the height and bulk of cable telecommunications companies roadside cabinets which can be installed without planning consent; and if he will make a statement; [105522]

(3) what plans he has to introduce planning control requirements to empower local authorities to control the length, bulk and location of roadside cable telecommunication cabinets; and if he will make a statement. [105521]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Telecommunications operators are licensed by the Department of Trade and Industry under the Telecommunications Act 1984. These licensed telecommunications code system operators are authorised under Part 24 of Schedule 2 to the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 (GPDO) to install specified telecommunications apparatus without the need to make a planning application to the local authority, ie they have permitted development rights.

Under the operator licensing arrangements, SI 1999 No. 2450 harmonises the conditions attached to operators' licences and came into force on 27 September 1999. These permit a maximum cabinet size of 1.8 m high by 2.0 m long by 0.8 m wide.

Under the GPDO, operators have permitted development rights for cabinets with a base area of up to 1.5 sq m. However, in areas such as National Parks, Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty, Conservation Areas and the Broads and Sites of Special Scientific Interest the permitted development right is subject to a prior approval procedure. Under this procedure the local planning authority has the opportunity to say whether it wishes to approve, within 28-days, details of a cabinet's siting and appearance. It can refuse approval if it considers this justified.

In all cases, the installation of cabinets with a base size exceeding 1.5 sq m would need a full planning application to the local planning authority.

Currently we have no proposals to amend the provisions of Part 24 of the GPDO.

Washable Nappies

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to promote the use of washable nappies for environmental reasons; and if he will make a statement. [105178]

Mr. Mullin: Disposable nappies are a significant proportion of household waste. However, when all environmental impacts are taken into account, it is not established whether disposable nappies are environmentally preferable in the majority of cases.

We encourage individuals to consider environmental factors when making purchasing decisions. Ultimately, though, it is for parents to decide which type of nappy is best suited to their circumstances.

Rural Bus Services (Chorley)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what monitoring his Department carries out of the level of bus services to rural areas in Chorley District. [105549]

Mr. Hill: Information on rural bus services is collected at County level.

Following introduction of the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant in 1998 the Department undertook a monitoring exercise to assess the impact of the new grant. This showed that over 1,800 new or improved services had been introduced in England; 42 of those services were in Lancashire.

Europe/North-West Rail Link

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what role his Department will play in ensuring direct rail links from Europe to the North-West in order to help businesses in this area. [105267]

Mr. Hill: I would refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 7 December 1999, Official Report, column 477W. Such services have been the subject of an extensive independent review, which Ministers are currently considering. An announcement on publication will be made in due course.

Traffic Congestion

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the cost to business of traffic congestion on British motorways. [105264]

Mr. Hill: Various estimates have been made of the value road users place on the total amount of time lost to congestion on the road network for different years and using different methods. They agree that taking all road users together and the British network as a whole the total runs to billions of pounds every year, and has been rising.

Although motorways account for a significant proportion of traffic—nearly 20 per cent. of all vehicle kilometres in England in 1996—analysis undertaken for the Government's report "Tackling Congestion and Pollution", published yesterday, suggests that they account for only about 5 per cent. of the total amount of vehicle time lost.

Wide Loads

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the congestion costs of the movement of police-escorted wide loads between 7am and 7pm. [105543]

Mr. Hill: Delays caused by individual movements of police-escorted wide loads will vary significantly between circumstances depending on the time of travel and the route taken. I am not aware that any assessment has been made of the overall impact on the journey times of other road users.

Waste Disposal (London)

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list, for each London borough, in the year 1998, the percentage of waste disposal by (a) landfill, (b) recycling and (c) incineration. [105327]

Mr. Mullin: The tables set out the available information for the percentage of municipal waste recycled, landfilled and incinerated in 1997–98 for the London boroughs. Full information is available for unitary authorities, which are responsible for both waste collection and disposal. For the boroughs that are waste collection authorities, the percentage of municipal waste recycled is shown. Landfill and incineration data are not available for individual waste collection authorities, as this is the responsibility of the waste disposal authority.

Water Industry

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on prospects for employment in the water utilities following Ofwat's recommendations on water pricing. [105147]

Mr. Mullin: The examination of the water industry's costs and efficiency assumptions is a matter for the Director General of Water Services. He has a statutory duty to secure that water companies properly carry out their functions and are able to finance them. These functions must be carried out in full compliance with all legal requirements, including drinking water quality (regulated by the Drinking Water Inspectorate), health and safety (regulated by the Health and Safety Executive), environmental standards (regulated by the Environment Agency) and customer service and continuity of supply (regulated by the Director General himself). In conducting his periodic review of water price limits the Director General expects companies to improve on efficiency savings that they have already achieved. It will be for water and sewerage undertakers to ensure that they maintain the necessary staff and other resources to meet these obligations in full.

In deciding how to meet price limits set by the Director General, companies will need to consider the range of measures open to them, including factors such as dividend policy, as well as the option of making staff redundant.

The Government believe that it is possible to deliver substantial quality improvements and reductions in customers' bills, for the benefit of consumers. The environmental and water quality improvement programmes will create significant new employment opportunities, although my Department has not undertaken or commissioned research on employment in the water industry.

Road Safety Schemes

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the expenditure by his Department and its agencies on road safety schemes in each financial year since 1997. [105485]

Mr. Hill: The expenditure was:

	£ million
1997–98	7.3
1998–99	50.6
1999–2000	[1]39.3

[1] To date

The basis for classifying road expenditure was revised from 1998–99 onwards, and the information for 1997–98 is not directly comparable with subsequent years. It may understate the position.

Leasehold Valuation Tribunals

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what monitoring his Department undertakes of the work of Leasehold Valuation Tribunals; and if he will publish a report on that monitoring. [105813]

Mr. Mullin: My Department monitors the work load and staffing of the Leasehold Valuation Tribunals and their progress in resolving a variety of disputes relating to leasehold property. In addition, we have commissioned a study to monitor the implementation of the leasehold provisions of the Housing Act 1996, including the experience of leaseholders and freeholders using the tribunals. A report on the study will be published by the summer. We are also examining all aspects of the operation of the tribunals as part of a wider review of the Rent Assessment Panels. I announced publication of a consultation paper on the review on 18 November 1999, Official Report, column 5W.

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he has issued to Leasehold Valuation Tribunals since September 1997. [105812]

Mr. Mullin: Leasehold Valuation Tribunals are independent statutory bodies and my Department does not issue them with guidance. The Presidents of Rent Assessment Panels, from which membership of the tribunals are drawn, are responsible for providing advice to members on legal, valuation and procedural matters relevant to the work of the tribunals.

Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the issues discussed during the recent visit to Cuba by UK and EU officials and scientists in connection with the forthcoming meeting of the parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species. [105810]

Mr. Mullin: In September 1999, at Cuba's request, a delegation from the EU Scientific Review Group of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) conducted a fact finding mission to Cuba regarding the exploitation of Eretmochelys imbricata (hawksbill turtles). The mission met representatives of the Agencia de Medio Ambiente (AMA) of the Ministerio de Ciencia, Technologia y Medio Ambiente, the Cuban CITES Management Authority, and the Cuban Fisheries Research Center. It visited a traditional fishing site, an experimental ranching centre and turtle shell stockpiles. Issues discussed related to a draft proposal by Cuba on hawksbill turtles for the next CITES Conference of Parties (April 2000). The delegation looked at the implications of the proposal for both the Cuban and the wider Caribbean populations of hawksbill turtles, the quality of Cuba's captive rearing facilities, techniques for marketing shells, and conservation benefits arising from the proposal.

The delegation was impressed with the stringency of Cuban controls, but was unable to see key data on population or monitoring of nesting beaches, and so could not reach any firm conclusions.

House Building (Shropshire)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many new homes have been built in (a) Shropshire and (b) Shrewsbury and Atcham from 1979 to date; and if he will make a statement. [105531]

Mr. Raynsford: From January 1979 to November 1999 inclusive, there were 32,400 and 6,250 dwellings completed in Shropshire and Shrewsbury and Atcham respectively.

Rats

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the findings were of the 1996 English House Condition Survey on the relationship between rat infestations and unfitness due to ineffective draining of foul, waste and surface water. [105482]

Mr. Mullin: The recent MAFF report "Rodent Infestations in domestic properties in England" covers this issue. MAFF's report tentatively suggests that there is a relationship between the incidence of blocked drains and outdoor rat infestation but this has not been supported with statistically significant analysis of the data so the conclusion needs to be treated with caution. Moreover, faults that might be expected to reflect a direct link with sewers, such as cracked or defective drains covers, were not found to be related to rat infestation. A copy of the MAFF report is in the House of Commons Library.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce his proposals concerning areas of outstanding natural beauty. [105471]

Mr. Mullin: Funding increases for Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONBs) have already been announced. The Countryside Agency has an additional £2.5 million in the current financial year for their management and conservation, rising by a further £1 million in 2000–01, which will bring the Agency's budget for AONBs to £5.7 million.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment expects to make an announcement soon on further proposals to strengthen the protection and management of AONBs.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub post offices. [105863]

Ms Armstrong: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness on 20 January 2000, Official Report, columns 519–20W.

Some support to sub post offices is currently provided through the non-domestic rating system. The sole post office or shop in a designated rural area is entitled to 50 per cent. mandatory relief from non-domestic rates, provided its rateable value is less than £5,000. Local authorities have discretionary powers to provide further relief up to 100 per cent. of the full rates bill for these and other properties in designated rural areas, with rateable values less than £10,000.

We are also considering the suggestion in the Report of the Urban Task Force, "Towards an Urban Renaissance", that there should be rate reductions for small retailers in designated urban priority areas.

In the 1998 White Paper "Modernising Local Government: In Touch With The People" we announced a general rate relief scheme for all small non-domestic properties, which will include small post offices in urban and rural areas. We aim to consult shortly on the details of this scheme.

Housing Associations

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many housing association units have been available for rent in each of the past 10 years. [105228]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 18 January 2000]: The available figures for Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) in England are given in the tables below.

Airline Accidents

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what studies his Department has undertaken of the numbers of cases at international airports over the last 10 years when civil airline accidents on take-off or departure have resulted in ground fatalities. [105981]

Mr. Hill: In 1995 the then Department of Transport commissioned NATS Ltd. to advise on the scope for detailed modelling of the size and shape of risk contours around airports, in connection with its review of Public Safety Zone policy. In preparing its advice NATS used the CASE (Client Aviation System Enquiry) database of aircraft accidents maintained by Airclaims Ltd. to identify information on crashes between 1979 and 1995 involving western-built airliner jets and turboprops. It used this information, in conjunction with data about aircraft movements, to calculate crash rates which would be relevant to the UK. From this information NATS used its own location model to determine the statistical distribution of crash locations in the vicinity of an airport. NATS also developed a consequence model to determine the size of the areas on the ground destroyed by aircraft accidents.

The crashes used for the purpose of this work were not limited to those which resulted in ground fatalities. The most useful approach was considered to be to draw upon the most reliable data available to calculate crash rates and model crash location and consequences, and then to apply those results in defining new boundaries for Public Safety Zones at airports.

London Underground

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements have been put in place to ensure that operation of the London Underground under a public-private partnership is subject to the provisions of the Customer Charter respecting compensation for delays experienced by passengers. [106071]

Mr. Hill: London Underground Ltd., which administers refunds under its customer charter, will remain as a public-sector company in the Public-Private Partnership (PPP). Therefore the refund policy will not be affected by the PPP.

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to what extent a full service has been provided on the Jubilee line extension since its opening. [106072]

Mr. Hill: When the Jubilee line extension began to open, in phases, from May 1999, services were only offered from Monday to Friday, and limited hours were operated. This was to allow contractors access to the line for completion works.

Now that the whole extension is open, and has joined the existing Jubilee line, full through services from Stanmore to Stratford, seven day a week services, and normal Tube opening hours are provided.

There have been some problems with reliability due to technical difficulties with new equipment and systems. I understand that London Underground is addressing these issues. In the four weeks to 8 January, the percentage of scheduled trains operated has increased to 94.2 per cent. LU has work in hand to improve reliability further.

Rail Passenger Partnership (Merseyside)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the applications he has received in connection with the Rail Passenger Partnership from Merseyside. [105890]

Mr. Hill: The first two successful bids under the Rail Passenger Partnership scheme, together worth more than £3.5 million, were announced on 8 December 1999. The Franchising Director will make further announcements on bids already received and those he is expecting to receive in due course. These include at least one from Merseyside.

Greenbelt Land

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those local authorities where the amount of greenbelt land exceeds (a) 90 per cent. and (b) 75 per cent. of the total land area of the local authorities. [105907]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Information on the area of greenbelt land in each local authority is not currently available centrally. Estimates under preparation, based on designated greenbelt areas shown in adopted and deposited local plans, should be finalised within two months. I shall write to the hon. Member when they are available.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which overseas distribution systems his Department is reviewing as part of its review of local government grant distribution systems; and when changes in the grant system will be introduced. [105917]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The DETR commissioned PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) to conduct a research project examining grant distribution systems used overseas. The initial phase of the project entailed PwC producing outline descriptions of 19 grant distribution systems used in other OECD countries. The 19 countries examined were:

Austria
Australia
Belgium
Canada
Denmark
Finland
France
Germany
Greece
Ireland
Italy
Japan
Netherlands
New Zealand
Norway
Portugal
Spain
Sweden
United States.

The preliminary analysis of the 19 countries by PwC can be found on the Local Government Association (LGA) website at http://www.lga.gov.uk/lga/rgd/index.htm. Discussion of the 19 outline descriptions was carried out at the joint DETR and LGA review group. The next stage of the project required eight countries to be selected by the review group for further analysis. PwC produced detailed reports on these eight countries. The eight countries were:

Australia
Denmark
France
Germany
Netherlands
Spain
Sweden
United States.

The preliminary in-depth reports produced by PwC can also be found on the LGA website. The next stage of the project required the joint DETR and LGA review group to agree which, if any, of the eight countries warranted further study. Four countries were selected for further analysis and a visit by representatives of DETR and local government. The four countries were:

Denmark
France
Netherlands
Sweden.

Papers recording the information gained from the four visits can also be found on the LGA website. PwC will shortly be producing their final report. This will bring together all the material from the research project.

The implementation of any change to the current grant distribution system will depend on the outcome of the consultation exercise taking place this summer and its timing will depend on whether legislation is required.

Welsh Assembly

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what training staff in his Department have received on the implications of the establishment of the National Assembly for Wales on their work in giving advice in response to inquiries. [106069]

Ms Armstrong: General information and guidance on the implications of devolution for the work of the Department, including the handling of correspondence and inquiries, has been promulgated to staff throughout the Department. All senior managers have been briefed on the need for good communications and relations with the devolved administrations, following the arrangements set out in the "Memorandum of Understanding and supplementary agreements" (Cm 4444).

We hope shortly to conclude and publish a bilateral concordat with the Cabinet of the National Assembly for Wales.

Rail Franchising

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will discuss with the Franchising Director a requirement that in the next round of railway franchises for services between (a) Holyhead and Crewe and (b) Cardiff and Crewe, companies are required to tender on the basis of at least two through-train services between Holyhead and Cardiff each day. [R] [105888]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director has invited proposals for improved services in Wales and the North West. In any renegotiations the Franchising Director will seek the best deal he can for passengers, in line with the Instructions and Guidance the Deputy Prime Minister gave him last year. The Franchising Director has met with Welsh Assembly officials to discuss their aspirations, and he will consult them as plans for future services provision are formulated.

Storm Damage

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what special financial assistance will be made available for coastal authorities in response to the damage caused by recent storms; and if he will make a statement. [106310]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Local authorities have statutory powers to deal with emergencies and are expected to budget accordingly. They may apply for additional financial assistance where there is a case for doing so under existing rules. All local authorities were sent copies of the current guidance notes and thresholds on 26 February 1999. To date we have received no applications in respect of the recent storms.

Multilateral Environmental Agreements

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he is making to the European Commission in respect of the arrangements enabling European Commission trade negotiators to take full account of environmental considerations and the requirements of multilateral environmental agreements. [105581]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The United Kingdom played a leading role in the development of the European Union's position on how the relationship between trade and the environment should be addressed in the proposed new Round of multilateral trade negotiations. This position was set out in the conclusions of the General Affairs Council prior to the third World Trade Organisation Ministerial in Seattle in December 1999. The conclusions of the General Affairs Council are consistent with the Government's priorities for action in this area. They include commitments to clarifying the legal relationship between the rules of the WTO and trade measures taken pursuant to Multilateral Environmental Agreements, and to taking environmental considerations into account throughout the negotiations. I attended the Seattle Ministerial, where I was able to discuss trade and environment issues directly with representatives of the European Commission.

The Government also strongly support the Sustainability Impact Assessment which the European Commission is undertaking to inform the European Union's negotiating position in future trade liberalisation negotiations. Officials from my Department and the Department for Trade and Industry will continue to participate in meetings with the European Commission and other member states of the European Union to discuss trade and environment issues.

Severn Trent Water

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the impact of Ofwat's price review on employment at Severn Trent Water. [106043]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Department has received a number of representations on this issue, including correspondence from the Managing Director and employees of Severn Trent Water, local union representatives and hon. Members whose constituencies fall within the Severn Trent area. The representations expressed concern that Severn Trent Water might make some staff redundant following the decisions of the Director General of Water Services on price limits for water companies, to apply from April 2000.

Setting price limits, at the price review, is a matter for the Director General of Water Services. He has a statutory duty to secure that water companies properly carry out their functions and are able to finance them. These functions must be carried out in full compliance with all legal requirements, including drinking water quality (regulated by the Drinking Water Inspectorate), health and safety (regulated by the Health and Safety Executive), environmental standards (regulated by the Environment Agency) and customer service and continuity of supply (regulated by the Director General himself). The Director General expects companies to improve on efficiency savings that they have already achieved. It will be for water and sewerage undertakers to ensure that they maintain the necessary staff and other resources to meet these obligations in full.

In deciding how to meet price limits set by the Director General, companies will need to consider the range of measures open to them, including factors such as dividend policy, as well as the option of making staff redundant.

The Government believe that it is possible to deliver substantial quality improvements and reductions in customers' bills, for the benefit of consumers. The environmental and water quality improvement programmes will create significant new employment opportunities, although my Department has not undertaken or commissioned research on employment in the water industry.

French Lorry Strike

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the total amount of compensation so far paid by the French Government to British road haulage firms following the French truck drivers strike in 1996. [106149]

Mr. Prescott: While the Department was pleased to assist claimants in lodging their claims with the French authorities, the claimants are under no obligation to inform the Government of the outcome. However, I understand that an offer of compensation has been made in respect of all eligible claims.

School Buses

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with local education authorities and his ministerial colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment about the contribution that school buses can make to reducing traffic congestion. [106164]

Mr. Hill: Congestion caused by the "school run" is one of the issues considered by the School Travel Advisory Group (STAG). The first report from STAG was presented to me and to colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Health on 13 January. A copy of the report and the Government response have been placed in the Library of the House. As recommended by STAG, we have commissioned consultants to identify and analyse examples of good practice in promoting bus use for travel to school and to produce a guide to best practice.

Motor Insurance

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will discuss with the British Insurers Association measures to avoid the practice of including motorists with criminal convictions on company insurances in cases where personal insurance is not available to them. [106288]

Mr. Hill: The main aim of our policy on motor insurance is to ensure that any driver who uses a vehicle on the road will be covered for their liabilities to third parties. To that end the motor insurance industry have agreed informally that they will always find a policy for anybody who holds a valid driving licence and is legally entitled to use a vehicle on the road. The premium charged reflects the risk attached to the driver and this includes driving history and any relevant convictions. This practice applies to both individual and company insurance policies. Seeking to prevent insurers from issuing any cover for valid licence holders would be likely to lead to an increase in uninsured driving.

DVLA

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 210W, concerning the DVLA, how many people waited longer than (a) five, (b) eight, (c) 10, (d) 15 and (e) 20 weeks for car or motorcycle licences which required a medical investigation by the DVLA Medical Unit in each month of 1999. [106715]

Mr. Hill: The information is not available in the form requested, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the (a) total and (b) unit cost of the DVLA's payments to private medical practitioners to process driving licence applications where the applicant declared a medical condition, in the most recent year for which figures are available. [106572]

Mr. Hill: In the financial year ended March 1999, a total of £2,576,233 was paid for 120,561 medical examinations (including opticians) an average payment of £20.98.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 210W, concerning the DVLA, how many people waited longer than (a) seven, (b) 10, (c) 15, (d) 20 and (e) 25 weeks for a bus or lorry licence which required a medical investigation by the DVLA Medical Unit in each month of 1999. [106733]

Mr. Hill: The information is not available in the form requested, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 249W, concerning the use of private opticians by DVLA, how the annual saving of £504,000 relates to the extra costs of £280,000 referred to in his answer of 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 5W. [106697]

Mr. Hill: The DVLA Medical Unit refers some 8,000 applicants per annum for visual field tests. The cost for NHS Consultant Ophthalmologists was £98 per test, some £784,000 per annum. Using private Optometrists, the fee will be £35 per test, or £280,000 per annum which gives an annual saving of £504,000.

Regional Chambers

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the cost to (a) central and (b) local government to date, of each of the regional chambers. [106125]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The costs of the voluntary regional chambers are a matter for their members. The Government have provided some support in-kind. In the East Midlands a member of the Government Office staff was seconded to assist with start-up arrangements, and in the South-East the Government Office has provided office space to the chamber.

Salisbury Railway Station

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list by (a) date, (b) category and (c) outcome, the incidents recorded by Wiltshire Constabulary at Salisbury railway station in each year since 1995; [106553]

(2) if he will list by (a) date, (b) category and (c) outcome, the incidents recorded by the British Transport Police at Salisbury railway station in each year since 1995. [106554]

Mr. Hill: The British Transport Police are responsible for policing, and recording the crime statistics, at Salisbury railway station.

The figures for 1998 and 1999 are in the table, listed by date, offence and whether they were detected. Ministerial Engagements

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (a) which Government Ministers he met, (b) which outside organisations he met, (c) which outside individuals he had appointments with, (d) what outside visits he made together with the mode of transport used, (e) what overseas visits he made, (f) the Cabinet Committees he attended, (g) which English regions he visited together with the mode of transport used and (h) what other official engagements he carried out, on (i) 1 September, (ii) 2 September, (iii) 3 September, (iv) 4 September and (v) 5 September 1999. [105881]

Mr. Prescott: Between 1 September and 5 September I was on holiday in the United Kingdom.

Allington, Incinerator

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his plans for a public inquiry in respect of the proposed incinerator at Allington. [106406]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My right hon. Friend decided on 21 December 1999, after very careful consideration, not to call in the planning application for the Allington incinerator for his own decision, but to leave the decision to be taken by the planning authority. The Government's policy on call-ins is to be very selective. It is right that in almost all cases the decision on whether a development should proceed should be taken by the local planning authority.

Therefore, planning applications are in general only called in if planning issues of much more than local importance are involved, and if those issues need to be decided by the Secretary of State rather than at local level. We have given as examples of cases where the Secretary of State might consider call-in appropriate those which may conflict with national policy on important matters; those which could have significant effects beyond their immediate locality; those which give rise to substantial regional or national controversy; those which raise significant architectural and urban design issues; and those where the interests of national security or a foreign government may be involved, 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 138W.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Council Tax

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the precepting councils in England and Wales in order of the average council tax payable in that area; [105180]

(2) if he will list the police authorities of England and Wales in order of the average council tax payable in that area. [105182]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The information requested on Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The table shows the notional average Council Tax per dwelling for each of the major precepting authorities in England. The more common measure for comparison is the Band D Council Tax from which all bills are derived and on the basis of which all taxpayers in the same band within an authority pay the same amount. This is also given. It has a closer relation to how Council Tax bills are derived and hence what taxpayers will be paying.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he intends to make a decision on the mixed oxide fuel plant in advance of the publication of the Green Paper on the management of radioactive waste; and if he will make a statement. [105573]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are in the process of considering all relevant issues concerning the Sellafield Mixed Oxide Fuel (MOX) Plant. Decisions will be announced as soon as they have been made. The timing of these decisions is unrelated to the publication of the Consultation Document on the management of radioactive waste. We aim to publish the Consultation Document in the spring.

GM Grain

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on the labelling of imported genetically modified grain. [105580]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Government's policy is that genetically modified grain imported into the UK should be clearly labelled. All such products currently imported into the UK must be labelled.

European Directive 90/220/EEC governs the release and marketing of GMOs. The Common Position reached in December 1999 on an amendment to the Directive strengthens the requirement to label clearly all products containing genetically modified organisms.

Index of Multiple Deprivation

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to what peer review by academics the methods devised by the consultants employed by his Department to compile the proposed new index of multiple deprivation will be subjected before it is used as the basis for distributing regeneration resources. [106284]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The 1999 Review of the Index of Local Deprivation is being carried out by the University of Oxford. In addition to the review being overseen by an inter-department steering committee, the University of Oxford have consulted an advisory panel (with over 40 members) throughout the review. The advisory panel has consisted of a large number of peer academics both in and outside of the University of Oxford, as well as local authority officials, research professionals and others.

The University of Oxford have also facilitated extensive consultation throughout the 1999 Review. Respondents to the consultation have included other Government Departments, local authorities, research organisations, academics and other organisations.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much of the money allocated annually to London boroughs through SRB and European grants will be lost if the new proposed index of multiple deprivation is used as the basis for allocating regeneration resources; and if he will make a statement. [106283]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The 2000 Spending Review, currently underway, will determine funding levels from 2001–02 to 2003–04 for all domestic regeneration programmes. It will take into account the new Index of Local Deprivation as well as other factors.

The SRB 6 Bidding Guidance, issued in December 1999, made it clear that the 65 most deprived authorities in the 1998 Index are eligible to bid for funding for comprehensive schemes even if they do not rank as highly when the 1999 Index is issued.

Resources from European Structural Funds have been allocated for the period 2000 to 2006 on the basis of the 1998 Index. London is expected to receive £160 million.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what criteria the new indicators of deprivation were used as the basis for the proposed index of multiple deprivation; and if he will make a statement. [106282]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The 1999 Review of the Index of Local Deprivation is being carried out by the University of Oxford. A consultation on the domains and indicators for inclusion in the 1999 index took place from 2 July 1999 and 16 August 1999. Over 125 responses were received and were carefully considered and reported on in a further paper 'Methodology for an Index of Multiple Deprivation' released by the University for consultation on 2 December 1999. This paper outlined the final list of domains and indicators for inclusion in the 1999 index.

Domains for inclusion in the 1999 Index;

Income deprivation

Employment deprivation

Health deprivation and disability

Housing deprivation

Education, skills and training deprivation

Geographical access to services.

In the report 'Measuring Deprivation at the Local Level' which was published by The University of Oxford in spring 1999, the criteria for the indicators which will make up the 1999 index were set out.

The criteria for the indicators were that they should be:

'domain specific' and appropriate for the purpose (that is being a direct measure for that form of deprivation) measure major features of that deprivation (not conditions just experienced by a very small number of people or areas)

as up-to-date possible capable of being updated on a regular basis

statistically robust nationally available at a small area level.

The responses to the final consultation of the 1999 Review of the Index of Local Deprivation are currently being analysed and a new index will be published in the spring.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the data underlying the new proposed index of multiple deprivation. [106285]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The 1999 review of the Index of Local Deprivation is being carried out by the University of Oxford. The University has carried out a consultation exercise on the methodology of the 1999 Index. The consultation closed on Monday 17 January having run for a period of six weeks.

The consultation paper "Methodology for an Index of Multiple Deprivation" set out the methodological techniques the University of Oxford propose to employ in constructing the 1999 Index. The responses to the consultation are currently being analysed by the University in close conjunction with DETR.

The final 1999 Index (due to be published in spring 2000) along with a summary report will include local authorities scores and ranks. This data will be presented for the whole of England at the ward and district level. The scores and ranks at the ward level will be available for each domain (income, work, health and disability, education, skills and training, housing and geographical access to services) and also be presented in a final composite Index.

The final published report will contain details about where to obtain the raw data used to construct the 33 indicators.

Local Government

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the local authorities which have decided they wish to have a directly elected mayor. [106320]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Bill, which if enacted would allow local authorities to have a directly elected mayor, is currently before the Other Place. Information about councils' current intentions should the Bill be enacted is not collected centrally.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those councils which have decided they do not wish to introduce an executive structure as set out in the Local Government Bill. [106319]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Bill, which if enacted would require local authorities to draw up proposals for an executive structure, is currently before the Other Place. Information about councils' current intentions is not collected centrally.

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106301]

Ms Beverley Hughes: This information is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the level of public awareness on Merseyside of the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. [106421]

Mr. Mullin: It is the role of the Government office for the North West to promote environment issues in the Merseyside region. The Government office are currently actively working with others to raise awareness in the North West about biodiversity issues. The Government office is a member of the North West Biodiversity Forum whose aims are to support, encourage and positively influence the conservation of biological diversity in the North West. Other members of the Forum include Lancashire County Council, the Environment Agency, English Nature, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Joint Countryside Advisory Service, County Wildlife Trusts and North West Water.

The Government office is currently promoting the production of a biodiversity booklet via the Forum to raise awareness among decision makers about biodiversity in the region to highlight, particularly, those species and habitats deemed to be under threat from development.

It is not a policy of the Government to carry out research into public awareness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 anywhere in the United Kingdom, although they aim to make as much information available as possible through the Department's website.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Neil Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of aircraft using UK airports use depleted uranium as ballast; and what assessment he has made of the potential risk to health in the event of a crash. [106307]

Mr. Mullin: Data are not collected in the form requested. However, it is known that early Boeing 747s, of which about 550 were constructed up until 1981, used depleted uranium counterbalance weights in their control surfaces.

A risk to health could arise only in the unlikely event that a crash, followed by a sufficiently severe and long lasting fire, were to cause aerosolisation and dispersal of the material. It has been established from the condition of the recovered counterweights and the evidence of fire damage following the recent Korean B747 aircraft crash that there has been no airborne dispersal of uranium from the crash site. Sixteen of the 20 counterweights used in the aircraft have so far been recovered.

Commercial Leases

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish the outcome of his Department's review of the operation of the Commercial Leases Code of Practice. [106860]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning hopes to make an announcement in the spring.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to place in the Library a copy of notes taken at meetings between Ministers of his Department and officials from non-departmental public bodies responsible to his Department after each such meeting. [106693]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Ministers meet NDPB chairmen and others to discuss a range of strategic issues, including confidential matters. Implementing this proposal would constrain the full and frank discussion that makes such meetings useful. It will therefore not be policy to place in the Library a copy of notes taken at such meetings.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the meetings he or his ministerial colleagues have had in the last 12 months with the local government network, listing who was present at such meetings and the topics discussed. [106818]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Over the last 12 months, Ministers have met many involved with local government. A wide range of topics have been discussed, including the Government's modernisation agenda and other issues which cross departmental boundaries. Such meetings will continue.

District Councils (Funding)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions by how much the financial settlement for district councils would change if the calculations based on enhanced population figures were removed from the provisional standing spending assessments for 2000–01; and if he will rank these figures in descending order. [106411]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The provisional standard spending assessments for 2000–01 were updated on 16 December 1999. These have been compared with figures obtained by removing (i) section (a) from the formula in paragraph 4.41 of "The Local Government Finance Report (England) 2000–01" and (ii) sections (a) (i) and (b) (i) in paragraph 4.47. The differences have been ranked in descending order and the information has been placed in the Library.

SARP (UK) Ltd

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the Health and Safety Audit of operations at the SARP (UK) Ltd. plant at Killamarsh, Derbyshire, and the reports of the Health and Safety Executive and the Environment Agency into incidents of the escape of acid vapour at the plant on 14 and 30 May 1998; and if he will make a statement. [106458]

Mr. Meacher: The investigations into the two incidents involving chemical releases at SARP UK were carried out by the Health and Safety Executive as a joint exercise with the Environment Agency. SARP UK was prosecuted in relation to those incidents and the penalties and costs awarded against the company were £120,000 and £150,000 respectively—a measure of how seriously the Court viewed these offences. In addition a detailed inspection of activities on the site was subsequently carried out resulting in a large number of recommendations for improvement of health and safety. The report of the investigation and of the findings of the inspection are being made public in a report published by the HSE so that the lessons can be understood by other companies. The report will be available from 3 February at the HSE Information Centres in London, Bootle and Sheffield. It will also be available at the Environment Agency Library in Bristol. I am placing copies in the Library of both Houses.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown), of 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 245W, on genetically modified organisms, if he will estimate the proportion of genetically modified organisms which will come within the scope of the Advanced Informed Agreement. [106963]

Mr. Meacher: The scope of the Advanced Informed Agreement (AIA) procedure within the Biosafety Protocol to the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity is one of the issues currently under negotiation in Montreal. Therefore it is not possible to estimate the proportion of living modified organisms (LMOs) that will come within its scope. The position of the United Kingdom and its European Union partners is that an effective and workable AIA procedure is necessary for the Protocol to contribute to biosafety, and that LMOs for food, feed or processing (commodities) should be included within the scope of the Protocol. At the negotiations, informal contact groups have been set up to look specifically at issues of transboundary movements of commodity LMOs and the scope of the Protocol.

PRIME MINISTER

General Pinochet

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations he has received from other heads of Government concerning the proposed extradition of General Pinochet. [106020]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The President of Chile has made representations to me on a number of occasions over the last 15 months.

Minister for Youth

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to appoint a Minister for Young People. [106452]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mr. Wood) on 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 353W.

Referendums

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Prime Minister (1) pursuant to his oral statement on 19 January 2000, Official Report, column 841, if he will list the limits which will apply to each political party in relation to their spending on a referendum on the single European currency; [106790]

(2) what is his policy on equalisation of spending limits on money raised by political parties on either side of the argument in future referenda. [106791]

The Prime Minister: We do not think it is practicable to regulate spending by political parties in such a way as to ensure that exactly equal amounts are spent by those on either side of a referendum argument. We do, however, think it is desirable to place a limit on what each party individually can spend.

Accordingly, schedule 13 to the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Bill provides that in any referendum held throughout the United Kingdom the expenditure limits for a registered political party should be based on the percentage of the vote secured by the party at the previous general election, namely:

£ million

Percentage of vote	Permitted limit
More than 30	5
20–30	4
10–20	3
5–10	2
Less than 5	0.5

Arms Sales (Zimbabwe)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how many defence manufacturers have made representations to (a) him, (b) his advisers and (c) officials about arms sales to Zimbabwe over the last 17 months; and if he will list the individuals and companies concerned, indicating the dates on which representations were made; [106937]

(2) how many representatives of arms manufacturers have made representations to (a) him, (b) his advisers and (c) officials about arms sales to Zimbabwe over the last 17 months; and if he will list the individuals and companies concerned, indicating the dates on which representations were made. [106938]

The Prime Minister: Neither I nor my Office has received any representations from defence manufacturers or their representatives about the sale of arms to Zimbabwe.

Communications (Interception)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister under what circumstances interception by the United States of communications initiated by UK citizens is permitted from UK territory. [106654]

The Prime Minister: It is long-standing policy not to comment on such matters.

DEFENCE

Future Carrier-borne Aircraft

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the Future Carrier-borne Aircraft programme; and if he will make a statement. [106311]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 7 December 1999, Official Report, column 453W, sub-para 14 to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key).

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106303]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Our largest public consultation exercise on policy matters in the last five years was that conducted to inform the strategic defence review which was launched on 28 May 1997. The then Secretary of State invited everyone who wished to contribute to the review to put forward their ideas and over 570 submissions were received. Each submission was analysed to record the subjects of concern, and circulated to the appropriate Working Groups for consideration. 486 authors consented to having their submissions made public. These were placed in the Libraries of the House and provided on microfiche to 12 public libraries across the United Kingdom.

In addition, in July and November 1997, the then Secretary of State and the Foreign Secretary jointly hosted three seminars to contribute to the strategic defence review to which a wide range of academics, journalists, Opposition Members and members of non-Governmental organisations were invited. Summaries of each seminar were placed in the Libraries of the House and published on the Ministry of Defence website.

The assessment of the submissions and the seminars formed part of the strategic defence review, the recommendations of which were published as the Strategic Defence Review White Paper (Cm3999) and the Strategic Defence Review Supporting Essays. Both documents were also published on the Ministry of Defence website.

Army Technical Support Agency

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Army Technical Support Agency. [107038]

Mr. Spellar: The strategic defence review (SDR) announced that the Army Equipment Support Organisation was being re-structured and that ATSA would be absorbed into the new organisation. Director General Equipment Support (Land) DG ES (Land) is being formed on 1 April 2000 as part of the Defence Logistics Organisation, incorporating the staff and functions of ATSA. ATSA is therefore to be disestablished formally as an agency with effect from 1 April 2000. The agency's final set of accounts will be laid before the House in the normal way.

British Garrisons (Germany)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he or his officials have held with the German Government about the deployment of additional troops from (a) Northern Ireland and (b) Great Britain to British garrisons in Germany. [105647]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 19 January 2000]: There have been no such discussions.

Pakistan

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions he had with (a) the Prime Minister and (b) the Foreign Secretary about the remit of the visit of the Chief of the Defence Staff to Pakistan; [106171]

(2) what issues he asked the Chief of the Defence Staff to discuss during his visit to Pakistan. [106172]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The Prime Minister, Foreign Secretary and I agreed that the Chief of the Defence Staff, General Sir Charles Guthrie, should visit Pakistan to deliver tough messages to General Musharraf, as one military man to another, on the imperative for a transition to democracy and regional security.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Access Funds and Hardship Loans

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of his review of Access Funds and Hardship Loans. [105977]

Mr. Blunkett: I have today announced a package of extra measures for 2000–01 and 2001–02 to widen access to higher education and tackle student hardship in England and Wales. The full year cost of the package has been estimated at £68 million. This honours the commitment I gave to Parliament on 13 July 1998 to monitor the new student support arrangements introduced after the Dearing Report. It also builds on the findings of the Review of Access Funds and Hardship Loans carried out last autumn.

The system of student support is working well: full-time entrants to higher education have increased by nearly 5,000 this year and more money is now going into universities and colleges. The system is fair and equitable to students, families, and the taxpayer. But our Review highlighted the specific financial concerns of older students, notably the costs of child care, especially for lone parents, school meals, and travel. The Review also found that mature students, in particular, need guarantees of financial support if they are to undertake and complete courses of higher education. These new measures target extra help at full-time mature students, disadvantaged young people and parents on low incomes with children in higher education.

In 2000–01, £17 million will be set aside for non-repayable Access Funds Bursaries for mature students of up to £1,000 per student, according to need, available at the start of the academic year. Further support, depending on circumstances, will also be available from a Hardship Fund of £57 million, for students who run into financial difficulties during the course. Hardship Loans will remain available to mature students but they will no longer have to take out a Hardship Loan before receiving support from the Hardship Fund. We will additionally provide an income-assessed grant to meet the cost of school meals for students with dependant children aged 4 to 16. We have also decided to ease substantially the income assessment for mature students who will now be able to have £7,500 of their income disregarded without losing entitlement to student support, instead of a minimum of £820.

In 2001–02, three further measures will be introduced to widen access and tackle hardship. We will raise the parental contribution threshold from £17,370 (at 1999–2000 rates) to £20,000, which will mean around 50,000 more families on modest incomes will no longer have to contribute towards their children's higher education. I shall also review the other contribution thresholds. Up to £10 million will be available for non-repayable Bursaries through Access Funds of up to £1,000 for young students from disadvantaged backgrounds, building on schemes already developing at a number of universities. Both these measures will help students from families on low incomes with no history of entry to higher education. We will provide further help for mature students by introducing a means-tested child care grant, based on the actual costs of child care of up to £100 a week per child, for those with dependant children, which will be fully disregarded by the Department of Social Security for benefits purposes.

Where necessary, we will make amendments to the Education (Student Support) Regulations 1999 and the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations 1999 to give effect to these changes for 2000–01. Amendments to Regulations to give effect to the changes for 2001–02 will also be made in due course. Changes to the guidance on the use of the Access and Hardship Funds will be given to the Higher Education Funding Council for England, and individual Higher Education Institutions, shortly.

Schools Adjudicators

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the persons appointed as schools adjudicators, indicating in each case whether they have served as members of local education authorities and to which political group in the authority they belonged. [105642]

Ms Estelle Morris: The list of adjudicators appointed is as follows:

Sir Peter Newsam
Dr. Alan Billings
June Brown
John Clark
Andrew Collier CBE
Peter Downes OBE
John Evans
Gordon Hainsworth
Ann Holt
Louise Kidd
Robert Lanwarne
Peter Neafsey
Professor David Newton
Dr. Hilary Nicolle
Anthony Webster
Robin Squire (resigned).

No adjudicator has been a member of a local education authority within the last five years. We do not hold full information on membership before that period.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the names of the adjudicators he has appointed under the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 and their political affiliation. [106565]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The list of adjudicators appointed is as follows:

Sir Peter Newsam
Dr. Alan Billings
June Brown
John Clark
Andrew Collier CBE
Peter Downes OBE
John Evans
Gordon Hainsworth
Ann Holt
Louise Kidd
Robert Lanwarne
Peter Neafsey
Professor David Newton
Dr. Hilary Nicolle
Anthony Webster
Robin Squire (resigned).

We hold no information about the present political affiliation of adjudicators. As a matter of public record, Peter Downes declared at the time of his application that he had undertaken significant political activity in the last five years as a member of the Liberal Democrats and an elected member of Huntingdonshire District Council. No other adjudicator at present in post declared an engagement in significant political activities during the previous five years.

Summer Camps

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has had from uniformed youth organisations following his announcement about proposals for summer activity camps for 16-year-olds; and if he will make a statement. [106469]

Jacqui Smith: We have received expressions of interest in summer activities from two uniformed youth organisations: the Scout Association and the Boys' Brigade.

Special Needs

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the percentage of special needs statements issued within 18 weeks by each London local education authority in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [106756]

Jacqui Smith: The Audit Commission publishes information on the percentage of draft statements of special educational needs produced by local education authorities within 18 weeks. Data for 1998–99 will not be available until the end of March and will be placed on the Audit Commission's internet website. The 1997–98 percentages for the London authorities given below do not include statements for which allowable exceptions from the relevant time limits, as set out in Part 3 of my Department's "Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs", have been made. In 1998 officials in my Department provided good-practice guidance to those LEAs whose performance was weakest. When the data for 1998–99 are available my officials will consider the need for further action to help LEAs improve their performance in this area.

Children in Care

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent guidance his Department has issued on educational provision for children looked after by local authorities. [106753]

Jacqui Smith: In June last year, my Department and the Department of Health jointly consulted on draft guidance on the education of children looked after by local authorities. Some 205 consultees replied by the mid-October deadline, and officials have since discussed some of the key issues arising from the consultation with partners in local government and the voluntary sector. Officials are now revising the guidance, and I expect the final guidance to issue before the end of March.

We believe that this guidance, backed up by support for local authorities during the implementation period, should enable them to fulfil better their role as corporate parents and raise the level of educational attainment of this group of young people. Higher educational attainment should in turn improve their general life chances.

Ethical Trading

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what consultations his Department has had with the Department for International Development to promote awareness of ethical trading among school children. [106127]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 24 January 2000]: My officials, and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, are currently working with the Department for International Development to develop a guidance document for schools on the opportunities and benefits of bringing a global perspective into different subjects and the wider life of school. This will draw attention to the many opportunities that the revised National Curriculum offers for raising children's awareness of a range of issues including ethical trading. It will also let teachers know where they can find advice, support and high quality resources which will support teaching and learning about these issues.

The programmes of study for Geography and Citizenship in the National Curriculum provide ample opportunities for pupils to learn about ethical trading since they include specific provision for teaching about the world as a global community, global interdependence and sustainable development. The emphasis is on explanatory discussion of contemporary issues and ethical trading would fall into that category.

School Buses

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment the School Travel Advisory Group has made of the contribution that the use of school buses can make to reducing traffic congestion. [106163]

Jacqui Smith: The School Travel Advisory Group (STAG), which presented its report to Ministers on 13 January, has made a number of recommendations in relation to school travel. A copy of the report has been placed in the Library. In particular, STAG has commissioned research into best practice on increasing bus use for journeys to school, to report in June 2000.

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106302]

Mr. Wicks: Full information in the form requested is not available. Details of the public exercises listed on our consultations calendar for 1999 are as follows. I will write to my hon. Friend giving as full a reply as possible by the end of February. My Department has now set up a central Consultation Unit to advise on best practice in public policy consultations.

Thalassaemia

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to raise awareness in schools of the problems facing sickle cell anaemia and thalassaemia sufferers. [106197]

Jacqui Smith: Schools will have their own health policies reflecting the needs of their pupils. Clearly where pupils suffer from particular conditions schools should include these in their policy where it is appropriate, taking advice from the local medical service and specialist organisations as necessary.

We have made available to schools advice and information on sickle cell anaemia and thalassaemia via the Government's Wired for Health website which has links to the Sickle Cell Society and UK Thalassaemia Society. The Wired for Health site is part of the Healthy Schools Programme, run jointly by the Department for Education and Employment and Department of Health (www.wiredforhealth.gov.uk).

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will require teachers in receipt of salaries in excess of point 9 on the Standard Pay Scale to submit themselves for assessment for threshold payments as a requirement of maintaining their existing salary levels. [106154]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have no plans to compel teachers to apply for the threshold—teachers will be able to choose to apply on a voluntary basis. We said in the Technical Consultation Document on teachers' pay reform that no serving teacher would lose out on existing salary entitlements as a result of our proposals. We have proposed to the School Teachers' Review Body that teachers who are successful at the threshold should receive a salary increase of up to £2,000.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers are in the salary bands (a) less than £10,000, (b) £10,000 to £12,500, (c) £12,500 to £15,000, (d) £15,000 to £17,500, (e) £17,500 to £20,000, (f) £20,000 to £22,500, (g) £22,500 to £25,000, (h) £25,000 to £30,000, (i) £30,000 to £35,000, (j) £35,000 to £40,000, (k) £40,000 to £45,000, (l) £45,000 to £50,000, (m) £50,000 to £55,000, (n) £55,000 to £60,000 and (o) more than £60,000. [106048]

Ms Estelle Morris: The table shows full and part-time teachers in the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special sector in England and Wales for whom data have been provided to the Teachers' Pension Scheme, by salary bands at 31 March 1998[1].

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105852]

Mr. Wills: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on 20 December 1999, Official Report, column 387W.

Disability Discrimination (Employment)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to improve the services available to help people with disabilities to obtain employment and retain jobs; and if he will make a statement. [104582]

Ms Hodge: Better employment services for people with disabilities are an important element of our commitment to comprehensive civil rights and an intrinsic part of our Welfare to Work policy. That is why we have devoted an additional £30 million for the Employment Service's specialist disability programmes over the three years 1999–2000, 2000–01 and 2001–02, with more resources for Access to Work, Supported Employment and the Job Introduction Scheme. Significant improvements to services to support disabled people have been a feature of all New Deals. Through New Deal for Disabled People we are testing new ways of helping people on incapacity benefits to return to work. We are considering how the main lessons from the pilots should be built into the next stage of this New Deal. We hope to make an announcement in the near future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Nursery

45. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the President of the Council to ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, when he expects a review to take place of the provision of child care facilities in the Palace of Westminster. [104972]

Mr. Kirkwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 14 December 1999, Official Report, column 122W. We have no plans for any further review.

Written Questions

50. Mr. Barnes: To ask the President of the Council if it is her policy that hon. Members should be able (a) to have written questions answered and (b) to table and have published early-day motions during parliamentary adjournments; and if she will make a statement. [104980]

Mrs. Beckett: The Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons is currently examining whether written questions might be tabled and answered during adjournments of the House. No proposal has been put to the Committee for the publication of early-day motions.

Millennium Bug

51. Dr. George Turner: To ask the President of the Council what assessment she has made of the benefits resulting from the preventive measures in respect of the millennium bug. [104981]

Mr. Tipping: The huge effort the UK's public and private sectors invested in tackling the Millennium Bug will yield real benefits. There are also many useful lessons to be learned. We are currently undertaking a cross-governmental review to ensure these lessons and benefits are captured. I will submit a report to Parliament on this issue later in the year.

House of Lords (Reform)

52. Mr. Dismore: To ask the President of the Council what progress has been made in reforming the House of Lords; and when that reform is expected to be completed. [104982]

Mr. Tipping: The House of Lords Act 1999 has removed the right of anyone to be a member of the House of Lords solely by virtue of a hereditary peerage. The Royal Commission under Lord Wakeham published its recommendations for further reform last week. The Government are now considering those recommendations and encouraging others to do the same. It is too early to estimate when the whole process might be completed.

Modernisation

53. Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on progress in modernising the House since May 1997. [104983]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Clark), Official Report columns 143–44.

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the President of the Council what progress there has been in the modernising of the House since May 1997. [104977]

Mrs. Beckett: Since the Modernisation Committee began its work, the House has had greater opportunities for scrutiny of the Government through the provision of extra time for debate in Westminster Hall; Thursday sittings have been introduced on an experimental basis to help Members balance constituency and Parliamentary duties; legislation has increasingly been published in draft and given Select Committee scrutiny; and better explanatory material has been provided with Bills.

Electronic Voting

54. Mr. Bercow: To ask the President of the Council what proposals she intends to put forward for electronic voting in the House. [104984]

Mrs. Beckett: The Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons examined this matter in Session 1997–98. It is for the Committee to decide whether or not to come forward with proposals for change in future.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Conservation Projects

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment she has made of the impact of conservation projects funded or partly funded by her Department on indigenous local peoples living within the area of the projects. [105289]

Clare Short [holding answer 24 January 2000]: In my reply to the hon. Member of 12 January 2000, Official Report, column 183W, I mentioned the major global evaluation study commissioned by DFID of British bilateral and joint-funded project support for environmental improvement and protection, and made specific reference to projects in Kenya and Tanzania.

The study also assessed DFID-funded projects for environmental protection and management in India, China and Brazil, including their impact on local people. The study reviewed 19 projects in India and found that all except two will have positive environmental impacts. Social impact has been varied. While many achieved environmental improvements benefiting local people, negative social impacts associated with resettlement and environmental health were noted in two projects.

In China, 16 projects were reviewed. It has been difficult to address social issues and identify social impacts in these projects given the reluctance of the Chinese authorities to support inputs which could be confused with political interference. Local people have benefited from the environmental improvements achieved by several of the projects but involuntary resettlement posed 'a potentially serious problem' in at least one project.

In Brazil, the key focus has been on environmental protection in Amazonia. All projects reviewed were found to have been at least moderately effective, with objectives complete or largely achieved in three projects out of the sample of six. Three of the projects were environmental research projects and two aimed to strengthen scientific capacity. As a result, immediate social impacts, positive or negative, were limited.

Biosafety Protocol

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's contribution to the formulation of the negotiating position adopted by the United Kingdom and the EU at the Biosafety Protocol talks taking place in Montreal. [106961]

Clare Short: My Department has played an active role in developing the position adopted by the UK and the EU throughout the negotiations of the Biosafety Protocol to ensure that it takes account of developing country concerns. One of the main benefits of the Protocol for developing countries would be to provide channels for financial and technical assistance to help them build capacity for the safe use and development of genetically modified organisms.

CABINET OFFICE

Drug Dealers (Bank Accounts)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proposals she has put forward to the Treasury, the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to deal with the problem of anonymous numbered bank accounts held by drug dealers in (a) Great Cayman, (b) the Virgin Islands, (c) the Bahamas, (d) Bermuda, (e) Luxembourg, (f) Switzerland, (g) Belize and (h) the City of London. [106581]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government actively support international initiatives to improve anti-money laundering standards worldwide, including measures to prevent the laundering of the proceeds of drug trafficking. In particular, we support and contribute to the work of the Financial Action Task Force on money laundering, the leading international body responsible for setting and enforcing effective international standards. The prohibition of anonymous accounts is an important element of these standards.

UK financial institutions are required by the Money Laundering Regulations 1993 to establish the identity of their customers and, under the Financial Services and Markets Bill, the Government are significantly enhancing the UK's efforts to enforce anti-money laundering standards.

Magistrates (Appointments)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to transfer responsibility for the appointment of magistrates in the County Palatine to the Lord Chancellor. [104957]

Marjorie Mowlam: As my hon. Friend knows, I am consulting widely within the Duchy on a proposal that these responsibilities should transfer to the Lord Chancellor. The final decision, as with all such machinery of government matters, will be for the Prime Minister.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Digital Television

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has for a public information campaign to advise consumers about the choices available in the digital television market. [106353]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The Government's objectives are to encourage the take-up of digital services by ensuring that consumers have clear and objective information about the benefits of digital television, the choice between free-to-air and pay services, the availability of various packages and platforms and the equipment needed to receive digital services. The Government also want to reassure consumers about the timetable and process for digital switch-over. With these objectives in mind, I had an initial meeting with leading figures in the broadcasting industry last November to discuss a prospective public information campaign. My officials are currently taking this process forward with the aim of launching an industry-wide campaign in the next few months.

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if all seats in the stadium at Wembley as proposed by Wembley Stadium Ltd. under the athletics mode accommodating 80,000 people meet the C60 minimum sightlines specification of the Green Guide and the Football Stadiums Advisory Design Council. [104330]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 January 2000]: Based on the ideal focal point at ground level on the outside edge of the running track, the independent report submitted by DLA Ellerbe Beckett confirms that the proposals put forward by Wembley National Stadium Ltd. to provide 80,000 seats in athletics mode, would reduce the C value of the first eight rows of seating in the lower bowl, and some seats at the end of the stadium, to below C60.

Farmers (Tourism)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what advice and assistance his Department offers to farmers who wish to diversify into the tourism business. [104920]

Janet Anderson: At a national level, as well as working closely with those with an interest in farm diversification, in particular, MAFF and the Countryside Agency, Tomorrow's Tourism highlights the need to maintain the economic viability of rural businesses through diversification such as farm tourism. Regional Tourist Boards, funded in part by the English Tourism Council (ETC), have primary responsibility for encouraging farm tourism by giving advice, support and guidance to new and existing tourism businesses, as well as those wishing to enter the sector. The Department's officials working in the Government Offices for the Regions also provide advice and support where appropriate. The ETC is currently considering a number of bids for funding from Regional Tourist Boards, including proposals to promote farm tourism more effectively. We will ensure this work is closely co-ordinated with the existing new proposals for farm diversification announced by right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at the end of 1999.

Tourism Industry

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much per head of population was spent on the promotion of tourism in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) the UK in the last year for which figures are available. [105051]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 17 January 2000]: In 1999–2000, the National Tourist Boards are receiving grant-in-aid as follows:

Board	Grant-in-aid (£ million)	Population (million)	Grant-in-aid per head of population (£)
ETB (now ETC)	11.8	49.59	0.24
STB	19.3	5.11	3.78
WTB	15.4	2.94	5.24
BTA	36.0	57.64	0.62

Note:
The population figures used to calculate the BTA's grant-in-aid per head exclude Northern Ireland

In addition, the industry is this year contributing over £16 million to the BTA's work. But support for tourism is not limited to Government support for tourist boards. This year DCMS will spend around £1 billion on the arts, museums, galleries and sport, much of which directly benefits tourism. Moreover, in 1998–99, the latest available figures suggest that English local authorities spend some £75 million and Welsh local authorities nearly £5 million on tourism promotion, while Scottish local authorities provided £7.4 million in grants to area tourist boards.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the items in the National Assets Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 16 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104488]

Mr. Hain: Since 16 February 1999 the FCO has sold 23 estate assets and 141 vehicles. Details are as listed. Total proceeds to date from completed sales amount to £29 million. Property sales are expected to realise a further £12 million in 1999–2000. Figures for this financial year are estimates.

The FCO receipts from sale of assets from 16 February 1999 to date

	Country	Number of sales	Proceeds (£)

Iran

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make representations to the Government of Iran concerning their support for groups opposed to the Middle East peace process; [106541]

(2) if he will make representations to the Foreign Minister of Iran concerning Iran's supervision of training for Hamas and Hezbollah in Lebanon. [106542]

Mr. Hain: Iranian opposition to the Middle East peace process and support for groups that oppose the peace process featured prominently in the discussions between my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and his Iranian counterpart during the latter's visit from 10–12 January. The Iranian authorities are fully aware of the importance that we and our EU partners attach to the Middle East peace process.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the comments in Amnesty International's 1999 Annual report on violations of basic human rights in Iran. [106543]

Mr. Hain: We welcome Amnesty International's latest report covering the human rights situation in Iran in 1998. Given Iran's continued failure to invite the United Nations Commission for Human Rights Special Representative, Maurice Copithorne, to visit, Amnesty's reports represent an important source of information on human rights issues in Iran.

Palestinian Jihad

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the sources of funds for the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. [106540]

Mr. Battle: Any assessment by HMG of the sources of funds could only come from intelligence and would, therefore, be exempted from disclosure under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of his Department's staff were (a) registered disabled, (b) women, (c) from ethnic minorities and (d) from (i) independent, (ii) grammar and (iii) other schools in (1) 1970, (2) 1979, (3) 1989 and (4) 1999. [106761]

Mr. Hain: As at 1 April 1999, the percentages were:

	Percentage
(a) Registered disabled	2
(b) Women	37
(c) From ethnic minority backgrounds	4

It is not possible to provide the information for the earlier years. To provide information on types of schools staff attended would involve disproportionate costs.

Biosafety Protocol

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's contribution to formulation of the United Kingdom and EU negotiating position being adopted at the Biosafety Protocol talks taking place in Montreal. [106959]

Mr. Hain: The FCO has worked closely with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and other Government Departments in preparing, with EU partners, for the resumption of negotiations on the Protocol. Two FCO officials are attending the talks in Montreal this week in the team led by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment. Along with our EU partners, we are firmly committed to achieving a Biosafety Protocol that secures worldwide protection from any adverse effects on the environment or human health from the transboundary movement of living or genetically modified organisms.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Review Procedures

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit review procedures; and if he will make a statement. [107149]

Angela Eagle: From April 2001, we propose to modernise the review procedures in Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit by bringing them into line with the arrangements for decision-making and appeals in child support and Social Security introduced under the Social Security Act 1998. Those arrangements have now been successfully implemented in other Social Security benefits. The Appeals Service has made—and is continuing to make—improvements to the level of service provided to appellants. We are proposing to extend that service to people who wish to appeal against local authority decisions on their Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit claims.

The changes will mean that, as now, people will be able to ask their local authority to look again at any disputed decision, but if the differences cannot be resolved they will have a right of appeal to a tribunal administered by the Appeals Service. People claiming Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit will also be expected to provide prompt evidence and information in support of their claims, in the same way as for other Social Security benefits.

These arrangements will ensure a consistent approach to decision-making and appeals across the benefits. Satisfactory decision-making procedures are an important element in the rights guaranteed by the Human Rights Act 1998.

Retirement Pension

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what benefit arrangements exist for retired people awaiting assessment of retirement pension; [105909]

(2) if he will make a statement on the timescale for the assessment and payment of pension on retirement. [105936]

Mr. Rooker: Prospective pensioners are invited to claim Retirement Pension four months prior to attaining minimum State pension age. This period allows time for the customer to make a claim and the Benefit's Agency to obtain the information needed to put the correct Retirement Pension entitlement into payment.

There are times, particularly at the beginning of a new tax year, when the contribution information needed to confirm Retirement Pension entitlement is not available. In this circumstance, the Benefit Agency makes an award based on the contribution information available and makes arrangements for payments to be made at an interim rate until a full assessment can be made. When the contribution information is available a revised award is made. The customer will receive revised notification of their entitlement and payment of any arrears due.

The Benefits Agency aims to clear 95 per cent. of Retirement Pension claims in 60 days. This is measured from the date of receipt of a claim form to the date an award is recorded on the Pensions Strategy Computer System.

If my hon. Friend has any particular problems regarding pension assessments, I will be happy to look into them if she provides details.

Benefits (Under-25s)

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of bringing benefit levels for people under 25 years in line with benefit levels for people aged over 25 years in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland. [106576]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

We are unable to estimate with any accuracy the cost of bringing Housing Benefit levels for the under-25s up to the 25 years and over levels. There is insufficient quantitative information on how this group responded to the change introduced in 1996, and without this information we cannot estimate the behavioural effects of reversing the change.

3. There are costs of less than £5 million for new entitlement in Scotland. Totals do not match due to rounding.

Minimum Pension Guarantee

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects the review of the minimum funding requirement for the minimum pension guarantee to reach a conclusion. [106736]

Mr. Rooker: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how many additional pensioners would qualify for the minimum pension guarantee if the saving limits were lowered by (a) £1,000, (b) £2,000, (c) £3,000, (d) £4,000 and (e) £5,000. [106707]

Mr. Rooker: No additional pensioners would benefit, if the savings limits in the Minimum Income Guarantee were reduced by the amounts proposed; in fact some pensioners would lose benefit entitlement completely.

Pensioners

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of the population are pensioners in (a) each county in the United Kingdom and (b) each constituency in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [104759]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The information has been placed in the Library.

Pensions Uprating (Overseas Residents)

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will respond to the Third Report of the Social Security Select Committee 1996–97, Uprating of State Retirement Pensions Payable to People Resident Abroad. [106422]

Mr. Rooker: The previous Government responded to the Third Report of the Social Security Select Committee 1996–97, Uprating of State Retirement Pensions Payable to People Resident Abroad on 19 March 1997, recorded in the Official Report, 19 March 1997, column 680W. There is no requirement for the present Government to respond.

Thalassaemia

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to improve financial and respite support for carers of sickle cell and thalassaemia sufferers. [106198]

Mr. Bayley: We have introduced the Carers Special Grant, amounting to £140 million over three years for English local authorities. The Grant must be spent on improving short term breaks for carers and on consulting them on the type of services they would value.

In addition, the National Carers strategy committed the Government to keeping financial support for carers under review, which we are doing.

Tariff Incomes Schedule

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the tariff incomes schedule of attributed income from savings of pensioners; and if he will estimate how many additional pensioners would qualify for the minimum pensions guarantee if it were lowered to a national yield of 6 per cent. [106657]

Mr. Rooker: An estimated 10,000 pensioners would become newly entitled to the Minimum Income Guarantee if a 6 per cent. rate of return is applied to savings over £3,000. Overall, 70,000 pensioners would gain from the change.

However, it should be noted that around 50,000 pensioners with savings at the lower end of the tariff scale would lose benefit, with a small number losing entitlement completely.

Rent Restriction

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of abolishing the single room rent restriction for under 25s in (a) the UK and (b) Scotland. [106575]

Angela Eagle: We are unable to estimate with any accuracy the cost of abolishing the Single Room Rent restriction. There is insufficient quantitative information on how this group responded to the change, and without this information we cannot estimate the behavioural effects of reversing the change.

Pensioner Incomes

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the additional annual cost of the minimum income guarantee if annual increases are in line with earnings rather than prices in (a) 2005, (b) 2010, (c) 2020 and (d) 2050; and what would be the further cost in each of those years of paying the basic state pension at the same rate as the minimum income guarantee. [105474]

Mr. Rooker: Estimates for the cost of the Minimum Income Guarantee (MIG) for the years shown are not available. This is because it is extremely difficult to obtain accurate projections of the future level and distribution of income and assets.

The cost of paying the basic State pension, including linked benefits, at the same rate as the MIG is shown in the table. The net cost takes into account savings made in means-tested benefits.

£ billion

	Gross cost	Net cost
2005–06	10.8	8.7
2010–11	15.7	13.5
2020–21	28.3	24.6
2050–51	87.3	—

Notes:
1. Figures are in £ billion and are in 2000–01 price terms.
2. Figures are rounded to the nearest £100 million.
3. Gross costs are estimates provided by the Government Actuary's Department. Costs net of means-tested benefits have been calculated using the 1999–2000 Policy Simulation Model based on the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey, and by PENSIM, a dynamic microsimulation model used to project pensioners' incomes to 2025. Net cost estimates for 2050–51 are not available.

HEALTH

Care Standards Bill

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the formal and informal consultation exercises conducted by (i) his Department and (ii) the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions which are (a) current and (b) recently completed and which are relevant to the matters covered by the Care Standards Bill [Lords]. [104177]

Mr. Hutton: The matters covered by the Care Standards Bill (Lords) have been subject to extensive consultation over a long period. Many of the measures were set out in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services" (Cm 4169—copies of which are available in the Library), which followed various consultation exercises. The matters relating to private and voluntary healthcare were subject to consultation following the publication of "Regulating Private and Voluntary Healthcare: A Consultation Document", copies of which are available in the Library.

Since the Bill's publication, I and my Ministerial colleagues, and officials in the Department have held a number of discussions about the provisions of the Bill with representatives of provider interests, service user groups and professional interests. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has held no consultations specific to the Care Standards Bill.

Methadone

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current annual cost to the National Health Service of methadone; and what is the latest estimate of the number of patients in each health authority area being prescribed methadone. [105257]

Ms Stuart: The net ingredient cost of prescription items dispensed in the community for methadone hydrochloride in England in 1998 was £10.8 million. Information on methadone dispensed in hospitals or drug treatment clinics and the number of patients receiving prescribed methadone in each health authority is not available.

Section 64 Grants

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to require health authorities which make Section 64 grants to charities to include a term in their contracts requiring them to be notified of changes in the charities' objects. [104821]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Health authorities have wide discretion over the terms and conditions they apply in the use by recipient voluntary organisations of Section 64 grants. This is appropriate given the wide variety of circumstances that may arise. In all their financial transactions, health authorities are required to exercise the standards of financial management and control specified in their standing orders and standing financial instructions—which follow the normal conventions for public bodies—and are audited on their performance. Making a specific requirement to be notified of changes in the objects of the organisation would not necessarily provide an additional safeguard, since changes may not necessarily have any bearing on the purpose for which the grant was made.

Foster Care

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to regulate the independent foster care home sector in respect of (a) quality of care provided and (b) charges to local authorities; [105911]

(2) what discussions he has had with the independent foster care home sector with regard to quality of care and cost to local authorities; [105912]

(3) what assessment he has made of the levels of charges made for the provision of foster care by (a) the independent foster care home sector and (b) local authorities; and if he will make a statement. [105910]

Mr. Hutton: We announced in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services" that independent fostering agencies will, in future, be regulated. The intention is that they will have to register with and be inspected by the new National Care Standards Commission. The changes are being introduced in the Care Standards Bill. As an interim measure, we are planning to introduce a voluntary accreditation scheme for independent fostering agencies.

If a local authority decides to place a child with a foster carer operating in the independent sector, it is a matter for that authority to satisfy itself that they are getting quality and value for money from the agency. This requirement is set out at Standard 24 of the recently launched National Standards for Foster Care, which seeks to underpin the provision of high quality foster care for children and young people throughout the United Kingdom.

We are aware that local authorities tend to pay considerably higher weekly rates for foster care when that care is through independent foster agencies, rather than directly through local authority foster carers. At least to some extent, this results from the extra functions provided by agencies and the particular needs of the individual children. We have no control over the rates paid by local authorities to independent fostering agencies or to their own carers. This is, however, an issue that we are looking at in the context of the Quality Protects programme, and in particular in relation to our plans to improve the number and quality of placement options for looked after children.

We are unable to provide a breakdown between local authority and independent sector foster care charges, as such figures are not collected centrally. We do, however, have information on the overall amount spent on local authority foster placements and for 1997–98 (the latest year we have available) the gross expenditure figure for England was £339 million. £15 million was also spent on children in other community placements.

There is also a Social Services Performance Indicator that showed the reported unit cost of foster care (gross weekly expenditure per child looked after in foster care) as £199 for 1998–99 and £211 for 1997–98.

Officials in the Department have had some discussion with representatives of the independent foster care sector about ensuring good quality standards, and these will be continued in the context of the voluntary accreditation scheme.

Road Traffic Charges

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the amount of charges collected in 1999 under the Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999. [106192]

Mr. Hutton: The Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999 came into force on 5 April 1999. In the initial three months no payments were made to trusts. In the second quarter £2,671,409 was collected and paid to National Health Service trusts in England, Scotland and Wales. In the third quarter this figure rose to £13,823,013, making the total paid to NHS trusts by the end of December 1999 £16,494,422.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the allocations he proposes to make to each health authority in 2000–01 in respect of additional funding for generic drugs. [106665]

Ms Stuart: £90 million has been made available to help meet the additional costs of generic drugs in 1999–2000. The table shows the additional allocations made to health authorities on 11 January 2000.

SCOTLAND

Student Finance

5. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations his Department made to the Scottish independent inquiry into student finance. [104931]

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend the Minister of State met the Chairman and Secretary of the committee in his capacity as a former education Minister at the Scottish Office.

8. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the First Minister regarding the Scottish independent inquiry into student finance. [104934]

10. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the First Minister of the Scottish Executive about reserved matters referred to in the Cubie report on education. [104936]

Dr. Reid: I meet the First Minister regularly and we discuss a wide range of issues.

9. Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Social Security regarding the implications of the report from the independent inquiry into student finance. [104935]

Dr. Reid: I have had no such discussions.

13. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the submissions made by the UK Government to the Scottish independent inquiry into student finance. [104939]

Mr. Wilson: The Department for Education and Employment made a submission to the Cubie Committee on 18 October. I also met the Chairman and Secretary of the Committee in my capacity as a former education Minister at the Scottish Office.

Food Labelling

6. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive about proposals to require special country-of-origin labelling for UK meat products originating in Scotland. [104932]

Mr. Wilson: None. Product labelling is an issue for the Scottish Executive devolved under Section 5 of the Scotland Act 1998.

Post Office

7. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has made to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the Government's plans for the Post Office in Scotland. [104933]

Mr. Wilson: I am in contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry over a range of issues including post offices. This Government are committed to maintaining a nationwide network of post offices, and to enabling the Post Office to develop to its full business potential.

Public Safety

11. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to meet the Health and Safety Executive to discuss public safety in Scotland. [104937]

Dr. Reid: I shall meet the Director General and Director Scotland of the Health and Safety Executive on 14 February to update myself on health and safety matters generally in Scotland.

Air Passenger Duty

12. Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effects of air passenger duty in the highlands and islands. [104938]

Dr. Reid: I welcome the announcement by the Chancellor to consult on changes to Air Passenger Duty that recognise the particular dependence of the Highlands and Islands' on air transport. My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I have encouraged a wide response to the consultation exercise. I know that the Chancellor will consider carefully the responses he receives and the effect of any changes he may make.

19. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarding the consultation exercise on the future of air passenger duty; and if he will make a statement. [104946]

Dr. Reid: I am in regular contact with the Chancellor on a range of issues. I welcome the consultation that has taken place on changes to Air Passenger Duty that recognise the particular dependence of the Highlands and Islands on air services.

Defence-related Employment

14. Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the First Minister on the level of defence-related employment in Scotland. [104940]

Dr. Reid: I am in regular contact with the First Minister on a range of issues including defence-related matters. Total defence-related employment in Scotland, on the most recently available figures, stands at 61,000. Clearly Scotland benefits greatly from defence-related employment.

Strategic Rail Authority

15. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps are being taken to establish the Strategic Rail Authority; and what its impact will be in Scotland. [104941]

Dr. Reid: The Transport Bill makes provision for the establishment of the Strategic Rail Authority. In Scotland it will administer all passenger rail franchises including the making of franchise payments to the relevant train operating companies. The Authority will also receive directions and guidance for Scottish passenger rail services from the Scottish Ministers together with financial provision from the Scottish Consolidated Fund to help meet the costs of these services.

Low Pay

16. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on low pay in Scotland. [104942]

Mr. Wilson: The Government are committed to tackling low pay through the national minimum wage. The Low Pay Commission found, in their First Report, that low pay occurs throughout the country and there is often much variation within different parts of the country as there is between one part of the country and another. Latest figures indicate that some 40,000 low paid workers in Scotland had already benefited from the introduction of the national minimum wage at the time of implementation (March-May 1999). The second report of the Low Pay Commission will be published soon, and we expect this to give more detail about low pay by region.

Coastguard (Oban)

18. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to discuss with the Deputy Prime Minister the proposed closure of the Oban coastguard station and matters relating to maritime safety in the area. [104945]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend is in regular contact with the Deputy Prime Minister on a wide range of issues including matters relating to maritime safety and coastguard stations. Substantial investment in new digital technology will allow a more responsive service to be provided from fewer centres. Oban will not close until October 2000 and Pentland will not close until December 2000 when the new equipment will be installed and the staff trained. There will be no compulsory redundancies.

Asylum Seekers

20. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has held with the (a) Home Secretary and (b) Scottish Executive on the number of asylum seekers and refugees placed in Scotland. [104947]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has been fully involved in the development of the Government's policies relating to asylum seekers and refugees, and recently discussed the implementations of these policies in Scotland with the First Minister.

Rail Bridge (Forth)

21. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received in relation to health and safety and repairs to the rail bridge across the Forth. [104948]

Dr. Reid: On this matter I have received representations only from my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

European Single Currency

22. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the First Minister regarding the impact on the Scottish economy of the European single currency. [104949]

Dr. Reid: I have had no such discussions recently.

Poverty

23. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made in tackling poverty among children and pensioners in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [104950]

Mr. Wilson: The UK Government have a range of initiatives to alleviate poverty among children and pensioners in Scotland: the Working Families Tax Credit, increases in child benefit, the restoration of free eye tests for pensioners, the Minimum Income Guarantee for pensioners, cutting VAT on domestic fuel and increasing the winter fuel allowance. In addition, the Joint Ministerial Committee on Poverty met last month and will ensure that the UK Government and the devolved administrations work effectively in partnership to alleviate poverty.

Shipbuilding (Clyde)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the STUC; and if they discussed matters relating to the shipbuilding industry on the Clyde. [104943]

Dr. Reid: I last met representatives of the STUC on 1 November and discussed a broad range of industrial issues. I very much welcome the recent positive development for the Govan shipyard following its sale by Kvaerner.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL

Scottish Bills

25. Mr. Hood: To ask the Advocate-General what powers she has to refer Bills of the Scottish Parliament to the judicial committee of the Privy Council before they are finally enacted. [104952]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I have the power to refer Bills of the Scottish Parliament, before they are finally enacted, to the Judicial Committee so that they can decide whether the Bill, or any provision of it, would be within the legislative competence of the Parliament.

European Convention on Human Rights

26. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Advocate-General what representations she has received from the Prison Officers Association on matters pertaining to the European convention on human rights. [104953]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I have not received any representations from the Prison Officers Association on such matters.

28. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Advocate-General what steps she is taking to monitor the impact of the European convention on human rights on the Scottish legal system. [104955]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: The Scottish legal system is a devolved matter. It is the responsibility of the Scottish Executive to administer it and to take account of the impact of the Convention on it. Under the Scotland Act 1998 I receive notices of all devolution issues raised in the Scottish courts, including all those which raise human rights questions, and seek more information where appropriate.

Ministerial Duties

29. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Advocate-General what assessment she has made of the scope of her duties in relation to (a) the UK Government and (b) the Scottish Executive; and if she will make a statement. [104956]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I am a Law Officer in the UK Government. I advise them on legal matters affecting Scotland (including matters of common interest to the whole UK, such as European Law and human rights). I exercise statutory functions as a Law Officer, particularly functions under the Scotland Act 1998. I have no duties directly in relation to the Scottish Executive. However, I may have to advise the UK Government on questions whether actings of the Executive, or Bills promoted by them, are within devolved competence. I can intervene in court proceedings raising such questions or raise such proceedings myself.

Immigration and Asylum

Dr. Godman: To ask the Advocate-General what recent representations she has received concerning the implementation of sections 101 and 102 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. [104954]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I have not received any representations concerning the implementation of these sections.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Trials (Timetabling)

36. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how often the Lord Chancellor meets the officers of the Council of Circuit Judges to discuss the timetabling of trials. [104966]

Jane Kennedy: The Permanent Secretary and the Chief Executive of the Court Service usually meet with the Council of Circuit Judges twice a year. The most recent meeting with the Chief Executive was on 2 December 1999. Although a wide range of policy and operational issues are discussed, the topic of the timetabling of trials was not raised, but if the hon. Member means listing, that is a judicial function and would not be discussed between the executive and the judiciary.

Youth Justice System

38. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, what assessment he has made of the impact of measures to reform the youth justice system on local magistrates courts. [104968]

Jane Kennedy: The impact of measures to reform the youth justice system, including measures aimed at reducing delay, is closely monitored. Piloted measures are the subject of separate evaluation.

Judicial Appointments

39. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the report of Sir Len Peach on judicial and Queen's Counsel appointments. [104969]

Jane Kennedy: Following publication of Sir Leonard Peach's report, the Lord Chancellor has embarked on an action programme to introduce developments in the selection procedures for judges and Queen's Counsel reflecting its recommendations. The Lord Chancellor has accepted the recommendation for the appointment of a Commissioner for Judicial Appointments and hopes that a Commissioner will be appointed during the first half of this year.

Sheriffs

40. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will take steps to increase the accountability of sheriffs. [104970]

Mr. Lock: It remains our intention to examine the role of the various organisations involved in enforcement, including sheriffs, in the course of the review of enforcement. Work on this element of the review will begin later in the year. The accountability of sheriffs will be among the issues examined.

County Courts (Closure)

41. Mr. Brady: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the proposals to close county courts in England and Wales. [104971]

Jane Kennedy: The Court Service constantly monitors and reviews the viability of its court network in the light of changing business needs and workload trends. This in turn will lead us to consider new ways of delivering civil justice which are not dependent on our present structure of civil courts. In addition, it is necessary to ensure that the civil courts and their locations continue to meet local user needs.

The following criteria form part of the consideration given to potential county court closures: workload trends, the condition and availability of accommodation and facilities in the local area, judicial sittings and waiting times, together with analysis of court users' needs. Before consideration can be given to closure, at least one survey of court users is carried out. Proposals for closure are always subject to public consultation, authorised by the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor has authorised public consultation on closure proposals for the following courts: Aberdare, Caerphilly, Chepstow, Gravesend, Lichfield, Monmouth and Workington; and has approved closure of Grays Thurrock and Great Yarmouth to take effect from 31 January 2000.

Rural Magistrates Courts

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the service provided by rural magistrates courts. [104967]

Jane Kennedy: The Government's policy is that magistrates courts are best managed locally by magistrates courts committees under the provisions of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. Decisions concerning the service provided at magistrates courts in their area, irrespective of location, are for the relevant magistrates courts committee to determine.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those countries which are presently refusing to permit the import of British beef. [104872]

Ms Quin: Among the EU member states, only France and Germany still ban British beef. Outside the EU, there are a variety of import bans, some of which are UK-specific, some are EU-wide and some apply to countries which have registered BSE cases among their cattle. British beef can, however, be exported to those non-EU countries with which we have so far agreed the necessary export health certification, i.e. Cyprus, the Falkland Islands, Hong Kong and Mauritius.

Over-30-Months-Scheme

Mr. Randall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the total tonnage of meat and bone meal forecast to be incinerated each year for the duration of the over-30-months-scheme; [104240]

(2) what is the total tonnage of meat and bonemeal resulting from the over-30-months-scheme forecast to be incinerated each year by each of the companies awarded contracts under the scheme. [104239]

Ms Quin: In the period to 31 December 1999, some 35,600 tonnes of meat and bonemeal (MBM) produced under the over-30-months-scheme (OTMS) was incinerated in the high temperature waste incinerator operated by Shanks at Fawley. This contract is due to expire on 31 March 2000. The Intervention Board's current forecast of future MBM incineration by the three companies awarded large scale incineration contracts is given in the following table.

Tonnes

Period	Shanks	Fibrogen	PDM	Total
1 January-31 March 2000	4,400	17,000	0	21,400
1 April 2000–31 March 2001	0	85,000	27,600	112,600
1 April 2001–31 March 2002	60,000	85,000	55,850	200,850
1 April 2002–31 March 2003	60,000	78,000	60,400	198,400
1 April 2003–31 March 2004	60,000	0	51,150	111,150
1 April 2004–31 March 2005	10,000	0	0	10,000
Totals	194,400	265,000	195,000	654,400

Note:

For the purpose of this exercise the forecast assumes that the OTMS will continue in its current form until at least the end of 2002–03, and that the contracted companies will obtain the necessary consents and commence incineration in line with their autumn 1999 programmes. The forecast will be updated in January/February 2000 to reflect the latest position.

Slaughter Premium

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement setting out the (a) policy and (b) economic reasons for paying a slaughter premium for cull cows. [105298]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The EU Slaughter Premiums for adult cattle and calves are paid in partial compensation for the cuts in support prices which will be made on 1 July in each of the years 2000 to 2002. Those price cuts will affect the price of most animals sold on the EU market, including cull animals. While the price paid for animals slaughtered under the Over Thirty Months Scheme in the UK is set by Commission Regulation rather than by market forces, the Agriculture Council decided not to exclude such animals from Slaughter Premium, because to do so would be to discriminate against UK producers.

Beef Imports

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of beef have been imported into the UK in each year since 1990 from (a) Argentina, (b) Uruguay, (c) Paraguay, (d) Brazil, (e) USA and (f) Canada. [105652]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The table shows the volume of beef and veal, beef offal and beef preparations (i.e. corned beef, canned meats, etc.) imported into the UK from (a) Argentina, (b) Uruguay, (c) Paraguay, (d) Brazil, (e) USA and (f) Canada between 1990 and 1998 and January and November 1999 as recorded in the Official Overseas Trade Statistics.

Hedges

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European laws set out the dimensions of field margins of cultivation adjacent to hedges. [103132]

Ms Quin: The European Community legislation which is relevant to this issue is that governing the farm-based arable and livestock aid schemes introduced as part of the 1992 reform of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). Under the rules of Arable Area Payments Scheme (AAPS), farmers in the United Kingdom are allowed to use the full field areas which are shown on Ordnance Survey maps as the basis of their claims, provided that their fields are fully utilised. If this condition is not fulfilled, then only that part of the total area which is actually cropped can be claimed. The use of total field areas is of considerable benefit to our farmers but it can only be justified if the extent of uncropped areas around field margins, including the area occupied by any hedges which may be present, is kept within reasonable limits. AAPS applicants have recently been notified about new guidance from the European Commission about the maximum width of field margins that is consistent with the use of full Ordnance Survey areas in aid applications. They have also been urged to seek advice about minimising the environmental impact of any action they may need to take in order to comply with the new guidance.

Intervention Board

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what weighting was given to the journey time of livestock in recent award of contracts to abattoirs by the Intervention Board under the over 30 month scheme. [102359]

Ms Quin: The Intervention Board, which is responsible for the administration of the over thirty month scheme (OTMS), attaches considerable importance to ensuring that sufficient slaughtering capacity is available in the right areas to minimise the travelling time for animals entering the scheme, consistent with the need to protect the public purse and ensure a good quality service. Tenders were grouped and evaluated by region to ensure that all areas received a reasonable level of service. East Anglia and South East England were grouped as a single region in view of the relatively small number of cattle coming forward from these areas for slaughter. As a result of the changes being introduced following the tender, some journey times will, inevitably, increase, but in no case will journey times exceed those laid down in animal welfare guidelines. Some journey times will decrease. Farmers will continue to be able to access the scheme through the network of 170 markets registered to collect OTMS cattle.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will rank in order of importance the criteria (a) past trade record, (b) location, (c) quality of service, (d) ability to offer a dedicated service, (e) ease of supervision, (f) throughput and (g) price used for evaluating bids in the recent award of contracts to abattoirs by the Intervention Board under the over 30 month scheme. [102356]

Ms Quin: Tenders were considered on a regional basis to ensure that sufficient capacity was contracted for the number of animals coming forward for slaughter in the region. Within this regional approach, under which East Anglia and South East England were grouped as a single region, the ranking (highest to lowest) of the criteria for evaluating bids received for OTMS slaughter services were: quality of service, price, ability to offer a dedicated service, ease of supervision and throughput (equal ranking), location.

BSE

Dr. Brand: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the incidence of new cases of BSE for each of the last five years. [102352]

Ms Quin: Numbers of cattle notified as BSE suspects to Agriculture Departments in Great Britain for each of the last five complete years are given in the table. Figures for those subsequently confirmed as BSE cases are also shown.

Year	Suspects restricted	Suspects in which BSE confirmed
1994	30,259	23,943
1995	17,945	14,301
1996	10,697	8,013
1997	5,604	4,309
1998	4,291	3,178

For 1999, the latest figures up to 3 December show that 2,824 cattle have been restricted as BSE suspects. Of these, 1,904 have been confirmed as BSE cases and 247 results are still pending. No confirmed cases have been found in animals born after August 1996.

Farming (Leicestershire)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people were employed in the farming sector in Leicestershire in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000; and how many he projects will be employed in 2000–01. [101060]

Ms Quin: The information requested is as follows:

People employed in the farming sector in Leicestershire

	Farmers, partners, directors and spouses working on the holding	Salaried managers and all other workers [1]	Total workforce [2]
(a) June 1996	3,884	3,003	6,887
(b) June 1997	3,833	3,003	6,836
(c) June 1998	3,837	2,974	6,811
June 1999	3,805	2,725	6,530

[1] Including hired, family and casual workers working on 1 June
[2] Excludes youth training

Notes:

1. The figures have been taken from the annual June Agricultural and Horticultural Census. These data relate to main holdings only.

2. In 1998 fundamental changes were introduced to the labour questions. It appears that this change may have led to the recording of additional labour who were not previously included in the returns. The change in questions has also led to a redistribution of labour between the various categories, most notably for salaried managers. Caution is therefore advised when comparing the 1998 and 1999 results with previous years.

MAFF does not have any projections for the year 2000–01.

Anaphylaxis

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of recent reports that sesame seed and oil in foods intended for young children can produce serious anaphylactic attacks; and what discussions his Department has had with Nestlé on the matter. [103363]

Ms Quin: It has been known for some time that sesame seeds can produce potentially severe reactions in individuals who have a pre-existing sesame allergy. Sesame oil could in theory also produce reactions depending on how much of the allergenic sesame protein is present.

It would seem sensible to advise that certain infants should avoid sesame seeds and food containing sesame, in case the consumption of sesame increases the risk of the infant developing sesame allergy. This advice is by analogy with the Committee on Toxicity's (COT) advice on peanuts. In its report on Peanut Allergy, the COT advised that during weaning, and until at least three years of age, the diets of infants with a parent or sibling with atopic disease (i.e. liable to develop allergic conditions) should not include peanuts and foods containing peanuts. This is because these foods may increase the risk of sensitisation and should be avoided. Further expert advice is being sought on this and the situation will be kept under review in the light of developing knowledge.

There have been no discussions with Nestlé on this specific issue.

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the level of charges for Meat Hygiene Service veterinary surgeons in independent abattoirs. [105472]

Ms Quin: On 1 December the Government announced that Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) hygiene inspection charges for this financial year (1999–2000) would be frozen at the levels set for 1998–99. This will result in a saving to the meat industry of some £7 million in charges in 1999–2000.

The Government have also given a commitment that the rates of MHS hygiene inspection charges in 2000–01 should not rise by more than the level of inflation above the levels charged in 1999–2000.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in the review of the operations of the Meat Hygiene Service. [103351]

Ms Quin: The results of the efficiency review of the Meat Hygiene Service have been published as an annex to the report of the regulatory review of the meat industry, the "Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group", which was issued on 13 December 1999, Official Report, column 89W. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library of the House.

The results of the efficiency review will be considered in the context of the recommendations made by the Red Tape Working Group. The Government expects to respond shortly.

Abattoirs and Meat Processing Plants

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many abattoirs and meat processing plants have failed to pay inspection charges for completed inspections in the last year. [103352]

Ms Quin: A total of 89 licensed slaughterhouses have failed to pay meat inspection charges in the last year for completed inspections. Meat processing plants are not subject to inspection charges.

Failure to pay has been defined as a slaughterhouse with an outstanding invoice dated October 1999 or earlier.

All 89 are subject to full debt recovery procedures within the terms of the new Civil Procedure Rules that came into force as of April 1999. At present these debts are regarded as civil cases and, where necessary, recovery will be pursued through the courts.

To address the problem of unpaid meat inspection charges, the Government has formally consulted on a proposal to amend the Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) (Charges) Regulations 1998. The proposed amendment would provide powers for the withdrawal by the Meat Hygiene Service of inspection services from individual licensed meat premises as a matter of last resort and in clearly defined circumstances.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made to the European Commission concerning the levels of veterinary supervision in abattoirs and meat processing plants; and what response he has received. [103354]

Ms Quin: In 1997 the European Commission initiated legal proceedings against the United Kingdom for the under-implementation of the veterinary supervision requirements of EU meat hygiene legislation. Since then the Government have made a number of representations to the Commission about the level of veterinary supervision in licensed premises (abattoirs, cutting plants and cold stores) in Great Britain producing or handling fresh (red) meat. The Government have accepted the need to bring the UK's veterinary supervision levels into line with the EU requirements in as short a time as possible, but pointed to the shortage of veterinarians willing to undertake meat hygiene work in the UK as a key obstacle to immediate compliance. The Government therefore set out a plan for achieving full and complete compliance by stages, over a number of years, as additional veterinary resource became available to the Meat Hygiene Service.

The Commission has noted the UK's programme and has made clear that it expects all the relevant controls and supervisory measures to be in place in the UK, in accordance with EU legislation, by the middle of 2001.

Separately, the Government also sought the European Commission's views earlier this year on the level and frequency of veterinary supervision required by the Fresh Meat Directive (64/433/EEC, as amended) for those low throughput (permanently derogated) slaughterhouses and cutting plants approved under Article 4 of the Directive. In summary, the Commission's advice was that the official veterinarian must carry out ante mortem inspections in red meat slaughterhouses, although post mortem inspections may be performed by either the official veterinarian or by an auxiliary. In addition, the hygiene rules must be monitored in all low throughput premises by either an official veterinarian or an auxiliary acting under his/her responsibility. Copies of the Commission's advice were placed in the Library of the House on 13 October 1999.

The Government are actively considering the veterinary supervision requirements for low throughput abattoirs and cutting plants in the light of the Commission's advice and will make an announcement on this in due course.

River Medway

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if his Department controls the rights to (a) fishing and (b) fishing sea bass from Garrison Point to Allington Locks on the River Medway; [105900]

(2) if he will make a statement on the relationship of the jurisdiction vested in (a) his Department and (b) Rochester Oyster and Floating Fishery over who can fish from Garrison Point to Allington Lock on the River Medway. [105901]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The English common law recognises a public right of fishing in territorial tidal waters. However, that common law right can have been abrogated or limited (including in relation to the methods by which it may be exercised) in a number of ways in the past, including by domestic or European legislation, by private Act of Parliament, by Charter or by ancient usage.

As far as is known, there is no exhaustive list of instances where the common law right has been abrogated or limited in the ways described. Therefore, only the courts are in a position to be able to rule on whether the fishery referred to by my hon. Friend between Garrison Point and Allington Lock is a public fishery or a private fishery owned by or granted to the Rochester Oyster and Floating Fishery and, if the latter, the extent of that private fishery.

However, the private rights, if any, in this fishery have been limited by various elements of EC legislation, including restrictions on minimum landing size and mesh size as well as by the establishment of the bass nursery area at the Isle of Grain Power Station Outfall.

Common Agricultural Policy Payments (Worcestershire)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 99W, if he will list by value the CAP payments including agri-environment schemes, broken down by individual category which were paid to farmers in Worcestershire in the calendar year 1998. [105589]

Ms Quin: Provisional figures for CAP payments made to farmers in Hereford and Worcester in 1998 were as follows.

Schemes	Payments
Arable area payments	25,553,526
Environmentally sensitive area[1]	29,839
Sheep annual premium	8,288,360
Suckler cow premium	6,452,000
Farm woodland premium[1]	216,811
Farm woodland[1]	250,990
Organic aid[1]	34,559
Nitrate sensitive area[1]	31,657
Countryside stewardship[1]	497,908
Habitat[1]	6,838
Beef special premium	6,757,687
Total	48,120,175

[1] These amounts include national as well as EU funding

Note:

Data is not available separately for Worcester because our administration operates on the combined county of Hereford and Worcester. We estimate that Worcester totals are broadly 40 per cent. of the combined total.

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the total value was of CAP payments made to Worcestershire farmers in the calendar years 1990 to 1997. [105497]

Ms Quin: The total value of CAP payments to farmers in Hereford and Worcester for the years 1994–97 were as follows:

1994	41,755,007
1995	49,161,871
1996	54,819,063
1997	49,498,031

Finalised data are not available separately for Worcestershire because our administration operates on the combined county of Hereford and Worcester.

These totals include national as well as EU funding.

Data for 1990–93 are unavailable as computer systems were not in place at that time.

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answers of 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 99W, if he will list the 10 largest recipients of CAP payments made to farms in Worcestershire in the calendar year 1998. [105512]

Ms Quin: Such a list is commercially sensitive, and as such the rules of confidentiality preclude disclosure and publication.

Pig Sector

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the estimated cost to the pig sector is of the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee's requirement to remove and dispose of offal. [105138]

Ms Quin: [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Sponigform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC) has no such requirement for the pig sector. The cost to the pig sector of the legal ban on using mammalian meat and bone meat in farm animal feed has been estimated by the Meat and Livestock Commission as £5.26 per pig.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what grants and other assistance his Department (a) gives and (b) plans to give to pig farmers outside assisted areas. [105109]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Formal and informal pig farming co-operatives were eligible to apply for a marketing grant under the Agriculture Development Scheme 1999. The scheme closed for applications on 30 November 1999 and successful applications will be announced in a few weeks. My right hon. Friend the Minister has also announced his intention that pig producers will benefit significantly from an extra £5 million earmarked to help farmers improve their marketing, collaboration and competitiveness. Discussions with the industry are presently taking place on ways of making best use of the money. In addition, pig producers may be eligible for grants under the Business Link and Small Business Schemes administered by the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of his initiative to increase the level of procurement of pork and pigmeat products by Government Departments and public authorities. [105140]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Following my right hon. Friend the Minister's letter to public authorities in October 1999, a number of the authorities have expressed an interest in developing a sourcing specification which would result in the purchase of product which conforms to British standards. This is being followed up by the Meat and Livestock Commission and the Minister's Meat Trade Adviser. The industry and some hon. Members, including my hon. Friend, have also become involved with the initiative.

Beef Exports

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support is provided by his Department for the export of bull semen. [105031]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Department does not provide direct financial support to farmers wishing to export cattle semen. We do, however, work closely with other interested organisations, including the Meat and Livestock Commission, to try and open up new markets for United Kingdom cattle semen and to promote exports via trade fairs and other events both here and abroad.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many live sheep were exported from the United Kingdom in 1999 for (a) slaughter and (b) further fattening. [105208]

Ms Quin: The provisional number of live sheep exported from the UK to other member states in 1999 for slaughter was 9,033 and 1,125,460 for further fattening.

EU Surplus Food Scheme

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total available sum available under the EU surplus food scheme; what was his Department's budget in advertising the scheme; and how much grant was finally used. [105661]

Ms Quin: The last year that the UK participated in the EU surplus food scheme was 1998 when the sum made available to the UK for the distribution of surplus beef was £20.3 million. No separate Departmental budget allocation was made for advertising the scheme; expenditure for advertising the scheme was made available from overall Intervention Board funds. The funds allocated to the UK by the EU for the surplus food scheme were fully utilised.

Sugar

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy in respect of ensuring that changes in the Sugar Protocol and Lomé Convention do not create further competitive advantages for beet at the expense of cane. [105492]

Ms Quin: EU/ACP trade talks are due to conclude next month. They are expected to roll forward the Sugar Protocol for a further eight years, and to provide for its review by 2008. In any review a major UK policy consideration will be the need for an equitable outcome for the cane refining sector to maintain its competitive position relative to the beet sugar sector.

Common Agricultural Policy Payments (South-West)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the total value to farmers in Dorset of CAP payments for (a) the 1998 calendar year and (b) the 1998–99 financial year. [105260]

Ms Quin: The information requested is not yet available. Figures for the calendar year 1998 are expected to become available in the near future.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farms in (a) Cornwall, (b) Devon, (c) Somerset and (d) Dorset received CAP payments in 1998. [105259]

Ms Quin: CAP payments in 1998 were paid to the following number of farms:

	Number of farms
Cornwall[1]	3,796
Devon	6,807
Somerset	3,524
Dorset	1,648

[1] Includes holdings on the Isles of Scilly.

These figures may exclude some farms which made small claims under agri-environment schemes. Precise figures on those farms could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

EU Flax Regime

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that the implementation of reform proposals of the EU flax regime will not take effect until after the 2000 harvest. [105609]

Ms Quin: The proposed implementation in 2000 of the reform depends on political agreement being reached by the Council of Ministers. Negotiations are underway at official level where the UK has already made clear the difficulties for industry and for enforcement authorities that early implementation would cause.

Food Labelling

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the labelling of British meat products. [105110]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: Rules on labelling of food products are harmonised at EU level. These are implemented in the UK by the Food Labelling Regulations 1996 (as amended) and the Food Safety Act 1990. There are additional national rules in the Meat Products and Spreadable Fish Products Regulation 1984. All British meat products must comply with the rules laid down in both these sets of Regulations. Enforcement of these rules is carried out by local authorities through their trading standards or environmental health departments.

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of a new labelling regime for food products. [105134]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Government are committed to giving consumers clear, easily understood information so they can make informed choices about the food they buy. We have already taken a number of steps for labelling ingredients derived from genetically modified crops and for labelling the quantities of key ingredients. We are encouraging the development of voluntary industry guidelines aimed at providing better, more consistent information to those consumers with specific allergies and will continue to press for appropriate changes to European and international rules.

We are also launching a new initiative to stimulate public debate on food labelling and find out what information ordinary consumers want to be given about the food they buy. We will also be considering different ways of making information available, including the use of modern technology, and whether new approaches are called for to deal with internet shopping. We are funding consumer research into these questions. We shall be holding open meetings and inviting consumers to write or e-mail us with their views.

The results of this exercise will feed into the work of the Food Standards Agency to whom the Government have given responsibility for developing food labelling policy. The aim is to improve the clarity of information for consumers, and help establish appropriate labelling regimes at national and international level.

Rats

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the findings were of the 1996 English House Condition Survey on the relationship between rat infestations in and around dwellings and (a) unfitness and (b) poor living conditions. [105483]

Mr. Morley: The results of the 1996 survey were published in the recent MAFF report "Rodent infestations in domestic properties in England". Figure 3.2 in the report relating to the fitness of dwellings shows that 1.3 per cent. of satisfactory and acceptable dwellings have rats outside, compared to around 3 per cent. of defective and unfit dwellings. Less than 1 per cent. of fit and unfit dwellings have rats inside the dwelling. Figure 3.4 relating to problems in the area shows that rat infestations were higher in areas with the most problems.

A copy of the report is in the Library of the House.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105809]

Mr. Morley: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has a Smoking at Work Policy which has been in place since 1994. Smoking is only allowed on Ministry premises in suitably equipped and ventilated rooms. In the few premises where it is not feasible to provide dedicated facilities, a total ban on smoking has been introduced. The Policy applies to all staff and visitors—it is made known to job applicants, forming part of the recruitment and advertising literature.

Support for smokers who would like to stop smoking is available for staff within the Ministry.

Farm Subsidies (Shropshire)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a breakdown of subsidy payments to farmers in Shropshire in the last year for which data are available; and if he will make a statement. [105528]

Ms Quin: Subsidy payments to farmers in Shropshire for 1998 were as follows:

Beef Special Premium	5,756,340
Environmentally Sensitive Area	1,506,008
Arable Area	22,562,468

[1] A small proportion of this total relates to non CAP schemes funded by the EU.

In some cases amounts include an element of national as well as EU funding.

Beef Special Premium Scheme

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the (a) total value of payments made annually under the beef special premium scheme and (b) average payment per farmer, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; [105207]

(2) how much money was received from the European Union for funding the beef special premium scheme, and how much was paid to British farmers, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; [105205]

(3) how many claims were made under the beef special premium scheme, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; how many of these were rejected; and what percentage this figure represents, of the total number of claims. [105206]

Ms Quin: The information given refers to England only. All payments made were 100 per cent. funded by the EU.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Insolvency

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his position regarding the draft regulation on insolvency proceedings, indicating the ways in which the regulation differs from the 1995 Convention in terms of financial impact through cost compliance. [106387]

Dr. Howells: The draft Regulation on insolvency proceedings was considered by the Council of Ministers on 2 December 1999 and will be further considered later this year.

A Compliance Cost Assessment was prepared as part of an Explanatory Memorandum dated 10 July 1996 on the draft Convention on insolvency proceedings. A Regulatory Impact Assessment was also prepared as part of an Explanatory Memorandum dated 23 September 1999 on the draft EC Council Regulation on insolvency proceedings. Copies of both documents were placed in the Library of the House.

Parental Leave

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the scope of the parental leave regulations; and if he will make a statement. [106830]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Department received over 300 responses to the consultation on the draft Maternity and Parental Leave Regulations. Since the publication of the final regulations it has received a wide range of views on various aspects of the legislation from both employers' and employees' representatives, individuals and other interested parties.

We are of the view that the regulations fully meet the requirements of the Parental Leave Directive and fairly balance the needs of employees and the concerns of employers.

Ice Cream Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from ice cream manufacturers on (a) competition within and (b) barriers to entry to the ice cream industry. [106140]

Dr. Howells: My Department has received a number of representations from ice cream manufacturers about the ice cream market.

MOX Fuel

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when BNFL first informed the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of a problem with MOX fuel that had been dispatched to Japan. [105723]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 20 January 2000]: I understand that the Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) was first notified by BNFL on 10 September 1999 of a problem concerning the possible falsification of quality assurance data for MOX fuel manufactured at the MOX Demonstration Facility. I understand BNFL told NII they were investigating the possibility that the problem affected both fuel still in the plant and already dispatched to Japan.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department was first informed of a quality control problem at the BNFL MOX Demonstration Facility involving Japanese fuel. [105724]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 20 January 2000]: My Department was first notified by BNFL on 10 September 1999 of a problem concerning falsification of quality assurance data for MOX fuel manufactured at the MOX Demonstration Facility.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the supply of MOX fuel by BNFL to Switzerland and Japan. [105725]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 20 January 2000]: BNFL will continue to pursue Mixed Oxide (MOX) fuel business in overseas markets. In Japan, in particular, the company is making major efforts to rebuild confidence.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) when BNFL first informed the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of a problem with MOX fuel that had been supplied to a Swiss utility; [105721]

(2) when his Department were first informed of a problem with MOX fuel supplied by BNFL to a Swiss utility; [105722]

(3) by what methods the damaged MOX fuel supplied by BNFL to a Swiss utility was returned to the UK for examination; when the fuel was returned; and if he will place copies of the assessments made in the Library; [105727]

(4) what action was taken by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate regarding the problem with BNFL MOX fuel supplied to a Swiss utility. [105726]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 20 January 2000]: A batch of 12 MOX fuel assemblies each containing 179 individual fuel pins supplied by BNFL were delivered to NOK's Beznau 1 reactor in November 1995. During a routine shutdown of the reactor in September 1997, it was confirmed that fuel pins in three of these assemblies had failed. The suspect fuel pins were removed from the affected assemblies and returned to BNFL by road and sea in March 1998 using the approved nuclear materials transport flasks which are routinely used in the transport of irradiated nuclear fuel. Post irradiation examination was undertaken by BNFL and the results provided to NOK. The assessments made on the fuel pins in question contain commercially confidential data which are a matter for BNFL and NOK. The matter is referred to in the annual reports for 1997 and 1998 published by the Swiss nuclear safety regulator, HSK. I have asked the Company Secretary of BNFL to write to my hon. Friend enclosing copies of the relevant extracts from those reports. A copy of that letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

I understand that, as this is a matter for the Swiss nuclear safety regulator rather than the UK's nuclear safety regulator, the Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, BNFL did not inform the NII about it.

My Department first became aware of a problem concerning MOX supplied by BNFL to the Swiss utility NOK on 14 September 1999.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the case of BNFL staff who have been dismissed in connection with allegations of falsifying quality control data for MOX fuel; [105832]

(2) if BNFL plans further disciplinary measures against members of their staff following the falsification of MOX fuel quality control data. [105831]

Mrs. Liddell: [holding answers 20 January 2000]: These are matters for BNFL's management. To date, three workers have been dismissed, and further disciplinary actions have been taken, or are in train, against a number of individuals.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent research reports he has received on the global economic impact of the first five years of the World Trade Organisation trading regime on (a) developed and (b) developing countries. [105586]

Mr. Caborn: My Department receives many academic articles which seek to analyse developments in the world trading system since the formation of the WTO and the contributions made by that institution to these developments. These articles appear in academic journals including The World Economy and Journal of World Trade.

Aero-engines

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about launch investment contracts in the aero-engine sector. [107147]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Under previous launch aid contracts between the Government and Rolls-Royce plc, that company is entitled to a reduction in the amount of levy which it pays in respect of engines which are derivatives of engines which have previously benefited from launch aid, in recognition of the extra investment which the company has made in producing those derivatives. Agreement has recently been reached between my Department and Rolls-Royce plc on the revised rates of levy which are payable on certain derivatives of the RB211–524, V2500, Spey, Tay and Industrial RB211 engines. My Department will be seeking a Spring Supplementary Estimate in due course which will include provision for the repayment to Rolls-Royce plc of certain of the amounts which have been overpaid by that company in respect of these derivative engines.

Deregulation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what orders his Department has made under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 in each year since 1994; and what plans it has to introduce such orders. [106085]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 contains two order-making powers: for deregulation orders (Sections 1–4 of the Act) and contracting out orders (Sections 69–70). The Department has made use of the powers as follows:

Deregulation Orders

The Deregulation (Fair Trading Act 1973) (Amendment) (Merger Reference Time Limits) Order 1996 SI 1996/345

The Deregulation (Restrictive Trade Practices Act) (Amendment) (Variation of Exempt Agreements) Order 1996 SI 1996/346

The Deregulation (Restrictive Trade Practices Act) (Amendment) (Time Limits) Order 1996 SI 1996/347

The Deregulation (Long Pull) Order 1996 SI 1996/1339

The Deregulation (Resolutions of Private Companies) Order 1996 SI 1996/1471

The Deregulation (Gun Barrel Proving) Order 1996 SI 1996/1576

The Deregulation (Insurance Companies Act 1982) Order 1996 SI 1996/2102

The Deregulation (Rag Flock and other Fillings Material Act 1951) (Repeal) Order 1996 SI 1996/3097

The Deregulation (Non-Fossil Fuel) Order 1997 SI 1997/1185

The Deregulation (Deduction from Pay of Union Subscriptions) Order 1998 SI 1998/1529

The Deregulation (Weights and Measures) Order 1999 SI 1999/503

The Deregulation (Pipelines) Order 1999 SI 1999/742.

In addition the Department has consulted on proposals to use the deregulation order-making power to provide a mechanism for redenominating share capital.

Contracting Out Orders

The Contracting Out (Functions in relation to the Registration of Companies) Order 1995 SI 1995/1013

The Contracting Out (Functions of the Official Receiver) Order 1995 SI 1995/1386

The Contracting Out (Functions relating to Wireless Telegraphy) Order 1995 SI 1996/2290.

In addition the draft Contracting Out (Functions in relation to Petroleum Royalty Payments) Order 2000 is currently being considered by Parliament.

Single Currency

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from overseas investors in the United Kingdom in respect of the UK's non-adoption of the single currency. [106312]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly receives views from overseas investors in the UK on a range of issues, including the single currency. The Government's position on EMU membership is well understood by investors.

The UK remains the premier location in Europe for inward investment and the Government are committed to providing a stable economic framework to ensure that this remains the case.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Denis Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made to extend the law in relation to a cooling off period to protect consumers who (a) purchase holidays and (b) join a holiday club following a high pressure intensive sales presentation. [106933]

Dr. Howells: As announced in our White Paper "Modern Markets: Confident Consumers", the Government plan to review aspects of timeshare legislation and whether it needs updating. Among the issues to be reviewed will be holiday/vacation club schemes. However, my Department has received no representations for a cooling off period for consumers generally purchasing holidays and we have no plans to introduce one. We will be consulting on our timeshare proposals shortly.

Garment Industry

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people were employed in the garment industry in the United Kingdom (a) in the last 12 months in which figures are available, (b) in 1979 and (c) in 1992. [106922]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The information is available in the following table:

Soya Imports

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry further to his answer of 20 January 2000, Official Report, columns 520–21W, how much soya was imported from countries other than the United States of America in (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999; and how much was GM soya. [106962]

Mr. Caborn: The available information is given in the following table. Statistics compiled by HM Customs and Excise do not distinguish between GM soya and non-GM soya.

Postal Services Commission

Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Chief Executive of the Postal Services Commission will be appointed. [107146]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Mr. Martin Stanley has been appointed as Chief Executive of the Postal Services Commission. He is a serving senior civil servant with considerable experience of working with industry.

Shipbuilding

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the availability of Shipbuilding Intervention Fund grants for 2000. [107148]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I have decided to extend the Shipbuilding Intervention Fund for currently eligible shipbuilding yards until 31 December 2000. Last year's rates were the highest possible within the EU's Shipbuilding Regulation for new-build orders—and the Government will be keeping those rates for this year in a bid to help UK shipbuilders win more contracts and compete overseas.

The rates of support will be unchanged from those in 1999, namely 9 per cent. for large ships and 4½ per cent. for small ships. Both rates are inclusive of Shipbuilders' Relief of 2 per cent. I will also be extending the Shipbuilding Intervention Fund for conversion contracts at 2.25 per cent.

Science

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action has been taken since May 1997 by each of the research councils to improve participation, retention and progression in science of (a) women and (b) members of the ethnic minorities. [106052]

Ms Hewitt: The Research Councils are equal opportunities employers and actively monitor both gender and ethnicity in recruitment, salaries and staff performance. They have implemented specific activities to support this policy including: training staff of recruitment panels; support for the Daphne Jackson Fellowship scheme for women returnees; and participation in the Research Council-Wellcome study to investigate why fewer women than men apply for research funds. The Councils are also considering setting up an Equal Opportunities management group to share good practice and expertise.

In 1997 the Research Careers Concordat signatories set up the Research Councils' initiative to implement improved terms and conditions of award for grant holders, students and fellows taking maternity leave.

All Councils make efforts to ensure that women are nominated for committees and public bodies and collectively sponsor the publication of the AWISE (Association for Women in Science and Engineering) magazine.

Further detail is available on the specific activities of each Council in its Annual Report.

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the items in the National Asset Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 22 February

1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104491]

Dr. Howells: The information requested by the hon. Member is not available in the form requested.

The Department estimates that assets totalling approximately £6 million will be sold in the year beginning 1 April 1999 as set out in Table 3 of the Departmental Investment Strategy available in the Library of the House.

Although not comprehensive in terms of all receipts, those from the sale of major assets, eg property, investments are separately identified in the Department's Appropriation Accounts which are published annually. Details of other asset sales are unavailable and could be extracted from records only at disproportionate cost. The Department's Resource accounts for 1999–2000 which will contain information about asset holdings and disposals will be published for the first time in autumn 2000. The Department's Executive Agencies already produce Annual Reports and Accounts, which contain similar information relating to assets. These Accounts are laid before Parliament and are available in the Library of the House. Accounts for our other associated public bodies are also available in the Library of the House.

EU Copyright Directive

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was discussed at the DTI-sponsored meeting on 7 October 1999, on the draft EU Directive on Copyright in the Information Society; [106054]

(2) if it is the Government's policy to support the European Parliament's authorised wording of the draft EU Directive on Copyright in the Information Society. [106055]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: We are not convinced that the mandatory exception for certain temporary copies as proposed in Article 5.1 of the draft Directive is the right approach, and we feel that the European Parliament's proposal to limit this exception to cases where use of protected material has been authorised by right owners would achieve a fairer balance between the different interests involved. We do not consider that this amendment would prevent or inhibit caching or other acts by intermediaries, which would clearly be inappropriate. However, the Commission and several other Member States are opposed to the European Parliament amendment, and its seems unlikely that it will receive sufficient support to be adopted. We have therefore encouraged dialogue between intermediaries and right owners, who are concerned that Article 5.1 will impair their ability to control illegal uses of their material, in order to establish whether other approaches can be found which are mutually acceptable.

We have no record of any meeting on the draft Directive arranged by the Department on 7 October 1999. However, we have facilitated several meetings between intermediaries and right owners on Article 5.1, and these discussions are continuing. We have also had numerous other meetings with a wide range of interested parties on various aspects of the Directive. We will, of course, continue with these consultation processes until negotiations on the Directive are completed.

Military Exports (Pakistan)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications for (a) standard and (b) open individual export licences for (i) military list and (ii) dual-use goods for proposed exports to Pakistan are currently awaiting a decision; and how many of these applications were made before 12 October 1999. [106645]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The entry in the relevant legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. As of 14 January 2000, decisions had not yet been taken on 76 applications for a Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) and 29 applications for an Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) to export to consignees or end-users in Pakistan goods listed in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List, entered in the Council Regulation (EC) 3381/94 setting up a Community regime for the control of exports of dual-use goods, or in Schedule 2 to the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996. Applications for individual licences may cover a range of goods with various ratings (and applications for OIELs may also cover a range of countries). Where this is so, the application is included in the table in the total for all of the relevant ratings.

Of these pending applications, 41 of those for SIELs and all of those for OIELs were received before 12 October 1999.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many and what categories of (a) standard and (b) open individual export licences have been (i) granted and (ii) refused for proposed exports of controlled goods to Pakistan since 12 October 1999. [106644]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The entry in the relevant legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 12 October 1999 and 14 January 2000, no Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) and no Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) were issued covering the export to consignees or end-users in Pakistan of goods subject to export control by being listed in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List, and goods entered in the Council regulation (EC) 3381/94 setting up a Community regime for the control of exports of dual-use goods, or in Schedule 2 to the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996.

In the same period two SIELs were refused covering goods with the rating end use, and no OIELs were refused.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

Export Licences (RDX)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many different United Kingdom companies or organisations have applied for export licences in respect of RDX in its raw form in the last two years. [106441]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating and most ratings cover a range of goods. RDX in its raw form is controlled under entry ML8 in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 1 January 1998 and 31 December 1999, the Export Control Organisation received 112 applications for a Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) and five applications for an Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) covering the export of goods with the rating ML8.

These applications were made by 23 different United Kingdom companies or organisations. It would entail disproportionate cost to undertake an examination of the paper records of each of the 117 individual applications to establish which covered the export of RDX in its raw form.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

All applications for licences to export goods entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 are assessed against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29W, and the European Union Code of Conduct on Arms Exports.

Labour Market (Stafford)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance his Department makes available to businesses and local government agencies seeking to (a) diversify the labour market in and (b) promote inward investment to Stafford. [106673]

Mr. Caborn: Some £280 million European Social Funding under Objective 3 is being made available for training-related activities in the West Midlands. These can be targeted particularly at the disadvantaged in the labour market, including those made redundant or with outdated skills.

My Department provides core funding for the inward investment activities of Advantage West Midlands. AWM works in partnership with InStaffs in Staffordshire and other local agencies to attract new investment from overseas and to support existing businesses.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent assessment he has made of the opportunities for diversification of the labour market in Stafford. [106672]

Mr. Caborn: On 17 January I announced a team which will be drawn from local agencies to investigate the problems facing local businesses and communities in Stoke and North Staffordshire.

I am pleased to confirm that I have asked Advantage West Midlands (The Development Agency) to extend this work to include Stafford.

The first meeting of local partners and the team is on 26 January. I have asked for an interim report to be completed by 11 February.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is visiting the West Midlands on 25 February and has asked officials to see if it is possible to include a visit to Stafford in his programme.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will visit Stafford to meet representatives of local government agencies and businesses to discuss diversification of the labour market in Stafford and promotion of inward investment. [106674]

Mr. Caborn: I am always prepared to meet with colleagues to discuss such issues and I recognise the particular problems in Stafford resulting from the recent redundancies announced by Alstom.

My Department provides core funding for the inward investment activities of Advantage West Midlands (The Development Agency). AWM works in partnership with InStaffs in Staffordshire and other local agencies to attract new investment from overseas and to support existing businesses.

Alstom

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the restructuring by Alstom of its operations in Stafford on the local labour market. [106677]

Mr. Caborn: It is too early to assess the impact on Stafford's labour market of the proposed redundancies at Alstom. Officials from Staffordshire Training and Enterprise Council and the Employment Service will be meeting the company on 25 January. Following that meeting a clearer picture of the company's plans should emerge.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support his Department will make available to (a) Alstom, (b) the Employment Service and (c) the local authorities following the announcement of job losses at Alstom's Stafford sites. [106678]

Mr. Caborn: I understand that representatives of the Employment Service and Staffordshire Training and Enterprise Council are to meet with the Company on 25 January to determine the precise nature of the support package required for those people who may be made redundant at Alstom.

They will then consider with the local authorities and Advantage West Midlands whether to apply for additional support from the Government's Rapid Response Fund to supplement what they are currently able to offer redundant workers. These include guidance interviews, retraining and job search facilities.

Synchrotron

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what requests the Office of Science and Technology has received from the Wellcome Trust to host an open competition to decide the location of the new synchrotron. [105626]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 18 January 2000]: According to the records of the Office of Science and Technology there have been no formal requests from the Wellcome Trust on hosting an open competition to decide the location of the new synchrotron. However, this issue was raised by the Wellcome Trust in a number of meetings with the Office of Science and Technology early in 1999, specifically on the 19 January and on the 26 January. Later discussions with the Wellcome Trust concerning the location of the new synchrotron have focused on the outcome of the investment appraisal that was undertaken for the Office of Science and Technology in June 1999. This study concluded that the current CCLRC sites would be more cost effective than a "green-field" site.

Mirror Group

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from other Government departments in respect of the cost of the inquiry into Mirror Group Newspapers. [106352]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I have received no such representation.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library the representations he has received calling on him to conclude his Department's inquiry into Mirror Group on the grounds of cost. [106021]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 20 January 2000]: I have received no such representations.

TransTec

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what departmental scrutiny has been applied to the Department for Trade and Industry grant awarded to TransTec for new premises at Coleshill, Birmingham, in 1988 since it was awarded. [106345]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The Department operates established procedures to verify that businesses comply with the conditions attached to payments of grant. These include visits to premises and project reports with independent certification. There is provision for grant to be reclaimed if the conditions are not met. Following newspaper allegations, the Department is inviting Mr. Ayriss and Mr. Dickinson in for interview concerning the circumstances surrounding grants to the Trans Tec group of companies.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department first received reports of the financial difficulties of TransTec. [106347]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: Following the announcement of the suspension of shares on 24 December 1999.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the Government grants received by TransTec, since 1987. [106346]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The Department's Selective Assistance database has no records of any grants or loans having been made to TransTec plc.

In order to give as full a reply as possible I asked officials to identify grants paid to subsidiary companies which, according to TransTec plc's Annual Report for 1998 principally affected the results of the Group and its assets in that year. The Department has not been able to establish whether these companies were subsidiaries of TransTec plc at the time offers and payments of grants were made.

The Department has no record in the database of any loans having been made to these companies.

In light of recent allegations I have asked officials to verify that for each of the grants listed in the table the conditions attached to the payment of grant have been complied with.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the meetings and events that Ministers and officials of his Department attended at which directors and personnel of TransTec were present in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, (d) 1998 and (e) 1999. [106351]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: No central record is maintained which could provide the information in the form requested.

Ministerial Conflicts of Interest

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last reviewed his Department's guidance on ministerial conflicts of interest; and if he will publish the outcome of that review. [106350]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: Guidance on the avoidance of conflicts of interest by Ministers is contained in the Ministerial Code, published by the Prime Minister in July 1997.

Misuse of Government Grants

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a list of his Department's procedures for dealing with reports of misuse of (a) DTI grants and (b) other Government grants. [106348]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: (a) The Department's Finance Handbook requires that whenever there is a suspected case of external fraud it should be notified immediately to Internal Audit Directorate, the Finance and Resource Management Directorate and Solicitors.

(b) The procedures adopted by other Departments are a matter for each Department.

Inquiries (Independent Inspection)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the DTI inquiries since 1985 that have been subject to independent inspection under section 432 of the Companies Act 1985. [106349]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The following schedule lists those appointments under section 432 which have been announced and where one or more of the inspectors were non-Departmental staff. However, all inspectors have a statutory authority separate from the Department.

Lord Archer

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department expects to conclude its investigations of Lord Archer of Weston-super-Mare's share dealing. [106006]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 20 January 2000]: Inspectors were appointed by the then Secretary of State on 8 February 1994 to inquire into dealings in the shares of Anglia Television Group plc between 10 and 21 January 1994. The inspectors reported on 19 July 1994.

The inspectors were reappointed by the Secretary of State on 4 May 1995 to inquire into dealings in the shares of Anglia between 20 December 1993 and 21 January 1994. The inspectors reported on 26 July 1996.

On both occasions, in accordance with established procedures and legal constraints followed by successive Governments, the reports were not made public.

Hollis Industries plc

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what the cost was of the investigation into Hollis Industries plc; [106024]

(2) what were the grades of the officials who investigated Hollis Industries plc; [106028]

(3) when he received the result of the inquiry into Hollis Industries plc; [106022]

(4) how many hours his Department's officials spent investigating Hollis Industries plc; [106026]

(5) pursuant to his answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 465W, concerning Hollis Industries plc, if he will place in the Library the documents setting out the normal procedures adopted by his Department in respect of internal DTI inquiries; [106097]

(6) what steps were taken by his predecessor to examine the options available under the Companies Act 1985 to determine the appropriate method of inquiry into Hollis Industries plc; [106027]

(7) if his Department's inquiry into Hollis Industries plc included examination of the disposal of Lock and PSS to TransTec; [106025]

(8) if, upon taking office, he reviewed the terms of reference of the investigation into the affairs of Hollis Industries plc. [106023]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 20 January 2000]: In line with normal procedures on such matters neither my predecessor nor myself took part in deciding the terms of reference of the investigation or the procedures or options under the Companies Act in relations to Hollis Industries inquiries.

The procedures adopted in relation to the investigation into Hollis Industries were conducted in accordance with "the Investigation handbook" and "Investigations—how they work", copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Records are not maintained in a way which enables figures to be given for the costs incurred. Staff at various grades were involved.

I was informed on 9 December 1999 that the investigation was complete.

In relation to the disposal of Lock and PSS to TransTec it is the long-established practice under successive Governments not to disclose details of individual investigations. However, when I appointed independent inspectors under Section 432(2) of the Companies Act 1985 on 20 January I asked them to investigate and report on the affairs of TransTec plc. It will be for the independent inspector to determine the detailed approach of the investigation.

If they think it necessary for the purpose of their inspection they have the power to investigate other companies in the TransTec group and events from earlier in the company's history, including its acquisition of the assets of Lock and PSS.

Indonesia (Military Exports)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by (a) type of equipment and (b) date of export the (i) military aircraft, (ii) light tanks and (iii) armoured vehicles which have been exported from the United Kingdom to Indonesia (a) from January 1998 to 16 September 1999 and (b) from 17 September 1999 to date. [105889]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

Details of major equipment exported to Indonesia in 1998 are included in Part 3 of the Government's second Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls. This information is taken from the UK entry to the UN Arms Register. Details of exports from 1 January 1999 to 16 September 1999 will be published in due course in the next Annual Report. There was an EU embargo on export of military goods between 17 September 1999 and 16 January 2000.

Information on the date of export is not published by Customs and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

TREASURY

Stamp Duty

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual revenue yield from increasing stamp duty rates on properties selling at (a) £500,000 and over and (b) £1 million and over, by 1 per cent. from existing levels in each case. [106506]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The 1999 Pre-Budget Report projection of stamp duty yield from land and property transactions was £3.2 billion for 2000–01. The estimates of extra revenue that would be raised from increasing the existing rate of duty of 3.5 per cent. to 4.5 per cent. are given in the table below:

£ million

Increasing rate on:	Estimated yield
Properties over £500,000[1] (including those over £1 million)	400
Properties over £1 million[1]	300

[1] Land and property including both residential and commercial

VAT (Vehicle Repairs)

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has completed the review into the VAT treatment of vehicle repairs carried out by motor insurers; and if he will make a statement. [107039]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise have completed their review after consulting insurers, car repairers, and motoring organisations, including the Association of British Insurers and the Automobile Association, as well as the Office of Fair Trading. The insurers' investment in productivity helps the competitive development of the car repair market and I do not propose any change to the current rules.

Poinding and Warrant Sales

Dr. Godman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive concerning the implications of the Abolition of Poinding and Warrant Sales Bill for the debt-recovery procedure of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise; and if he will make a statement. [105748]

Dawn Primarolo: Officials in the Revenue Departments and the Scottish Executive have discussed the implications of this Bill. They will also be considering the Scottish Law Commission's discussion paper on Poinding and Warrant Sales published in November last year. This raises similar considerations and looks at options for reform, and will be considered very carefully. Our main concern is to ensure that there will remain an adequate power of recovery in Scotland for the Revenue Departments.

EU Budget

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the EU's budget, broken down by substantial composite budget category, is taken up by administrative costs (i) in real terms and (ii) expressed as a percentage. [106393]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In 1998 (the most recent year for which final data are available) total administrative costs in the EU were 4,250 million euros in real terms.

Total administrative costs as a percentage of the total Community budget in 1998 were 4.8 per cent.

Health Insurance

Mr. Efford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received regarding the regulation of permanent health insurance companies by the Financial Services Authority; and if he will make a statement; [106494]

(2) what representations he has received regarding third party access to the Financial Services Authority's single ombudsman service for employees covered by permanent health insurance; and if he will make a statement; [106497]

(3) if permanent health insurers will be required to be authorised by the Financial Services Authority; [106498]

(4) if he will list the criteria under which businesses with group permanent health insurance policies can complain to the insurance industry's ombudsman service; and if he will make a statement; [106502]

(5) if group permanent health insurance policies will be covered by the Financial Services Authority's ombudsman scheme; [106499]

(6) how many businesses have complained to the insurance industry's ombudsman service during the last year for which statistics are available; and how many complaints were successful. [106503]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Permanent health insurers carrying on business in the United Kingdom will be required to be authorised either by the Financial Services Authority (FSA) or, in the case of European Community companies incorporated and with their head offices in another member state, to be authorised in accordance with Article 6 of the first long term insurance Directive.

No data are available which would distinguish enquiries and complaints brought by businesses as distinct from individuals.

The Treasury receives considerable correspondence on a range of issues concerning the insurance industry, but representations about the regulation of permanent health insurance companies have not been especially prominent.

The criteria that render a complaint eligible for consideration under the rules of the two main Ombudsmen schemes are determined by the schemes' terms of reference and by the interpretation of those terms by the parties to those arrangements.

The Financial Services Authority and the Financial Services Ombudsman Scheme issued a consultation paper (FSA Consultation Paper 33) last November on various aspects of the proposed scheme. The consultation ends on 10 February 2000. Copies of the consultation document are available from the FSA.

Departmental Productivity

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of his Department's activity, as targeted under Objective Ten of the PSA productivity targets, has been reviewed. [106800]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Treasury's Public Service Agreement committed it to draw up a forward programme for reviewing services and activities systematically over five years under the Better Quality Services initiative by September 1999 and this has been achieved. Activities representing 34 per cent. of costs will have been reviewed by the end of the first year, and 60 per cent. of reviews should be complete by March 2003.

Early Retirement

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employees of his Department took early retirement packages; and at what total cost in the financial year 1996–97. [104100]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Eight Treasury staff left the Department on early retirement terms in the financial year 1996–97. The Department incurred costs in respect of five of these totalling £195,324.63 in 1996–97.

Venture Capital

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield for (a) the first year and (b) a full year from abolishing the (i) enterprise investment scheme and (ii) venture capital trusts; and if he will make a statement. [106463]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The estimated costs of tax reliefs for the Enterprise Investment Scheme and Venture Capital Trusts are £100 million and £80 million respectively for 1999–2000. Investors generally claim tax relief under these schemes in their tax returns so the first year yield from abolition would be small. In practice it is unlikely that a yield of this order would be realised as the money which would have been invested in the schemes would be diverted elsewhere with a knock-on effect on other reliefs. The Enterprise Investment Scheme and Venture Capital Trust scheme play a valuable role in encouraging investment in small higher risk trading companies which have difficulty in raising capital from other sources to develop and grow.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) first year and (b) full year revenue yield from introducing a single, untapered, rate of capital gains tax of 40 per cent.; how this yield would change over each of the next 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [106508]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The full year yields, first year and medium terms, of charging a 40 per cent. tax rate, irrespective of income, on the untapered gains of all individuals and trusts are shown in the table. Estimates are given after taking into account the likely effect on capital gains tax yield of changes to the volume and timing of disposals in a full year, caused by changes in taxpayers' behaviour. Capital Gains Tax liabilities for 2000–01 will normally be payable in 2001–02.

Capital gains made

Charge all untapered gains to tax at 40 per cent.	Full year yield 2000–01 £ million	Full year yield Medium term £ million
With behavioural effects (volume and timing)	600	800

Capital gains made by companies, including those gains of insurance companies which are attributable to policy holders, are chargeable to corporation tax and, as such, excluded from the above figures.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield from abolishing capital gains tax relief on gains accrued but unrealised at death; and if he will make a statement. [106460]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The latest available estimate of the cost of Capital Gains Tax relief for gains accrued but unrealised at death is £850 million for 1999–2000.

In practice, the yield from abolition of the relief may be significantly different from the existing cost owing to changes in taxpayers' behaviour.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual (a) first year and (b) full year revenue yield from reducing the capital gains tax annual exempt amount for individuals to (i) £5,000, (ii) £2,500 and (iii) zero; and if he will make a statement. [106507]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The full year yields from reducing the Annual Exempt Amount to £5,000 and £2,500 respectively from 2000–01 are shown in the table. Estimates are given after taking into account the likely effect on capital gains tax yield of changes to the volume of disposals in a full year, caused by changes in taxpayers' behaviour. Capital Gains Tax liabilities for 2000–01 will normally be payable in 2001–02.

Reducing annual exempt amount to:	Full year yield 2000–01 £ million	Full year yield medium term £ million
With behavioural effects
£5,000	100	150
£2,500	350	450

Comparable estimates for very low levels of the AEA, and zero in particular, cannot be made with sufficient precision as some of the underlying assumptions become increasingly inappropriate and the effect of taxpayers' behaviour cannot be estimated reliably.

However, the latest estimate of the cost of the Annual Exempt Amount is £2,000 million for 1999–2000.

Child Benefits

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what are the (a) post-tax earnings and (b) total child-related benefits of a dual-earner couple with two children under the age of 11 years, both earning the minimum wage and where one works (i) full-time and (ii) 16 hours a week; [106137]

(2) what are the (a) post-tax earnings and (b) total child-related benefits of a single parent with two children under the age of 11 years, earning the minimum wage and working (i) full-time and (ii) 16 hours a week. [106136]

Dawn Primarolo: Figures for those earning the minimum wage and with two children under 11 are given in the table. Child benefit is the only child-related benefit.

£/week

	Earnings, less income tax and National Insurance contributions, plus Working Families Tax Credit	Child Benefit
Couple
Both working full time	256.80	24.00
One working full time, one working 16 hours per week	231.45	24.00
Lone Parent
Working full time	205.53	[1]24.00
Working 16 hours per week	149.60	[1]24.00

[1] Lone parents who claimed child benefit before July 1998 and have claimed continuously as lone parents are entitled to a higher rate of child benefit. It can also be claimed by lone parents in continuous receipt of the lone parent premium in IS/JSA moving off benefit into work; or who come off certain other benefits providing the claim is made within one month of coming off the other benefit. With two children under 11 such lone parents would receive £26.70 instead of £24.00.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional yield for National Insurance contributions in each of the next five financial years if the upper earnings limit for employee contributions and the upper profits limit for self-employed contributions were to be raised in line with average earnings. [103142]

Dawn Primarolo: The levels of upper earnings limits have been announced for 2000–01 and 2001–02. However, if the limits were increased in the following three years by average earnings instead of inflation then the additional yield this would generate is shown in the table:

	Weekly level of the UEL/UPL if increased by average earnings from 2001–02 (£)	Yield against current proposals (£ million)
2002–03	600	130
2003–04	625	200
2004–05	650	335

The estimates are consistent with projections given in the November 1999 pre-Budget Report.

Tax and Benefits Reform

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of his tax and benefits reforms in making work pay. [106862]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are committed to creating employment opportunities for those who want to work while providing security for those who cannot.

A key element of this strategy is to ensure that work pays by creating the right incentives, through the tax and benefit system, at every level of the labour market.

The Working Families Tax Credit, combined with the reforms to income tax and National Insurance Contributions, extends employment opportunity for all and increases the rewards from work.

Combined with the National Minimum Wage and other tax and benefit reforms the WFTC will guarantee a minimum income of £200 a week for a family with someone in full-time employment—£80 a week more than a couple would receive on Income Support;

The Working Families Tax Credit helps make work pay for 1.4 million low and middle income working families with children who gain, on average, £24 a week more than under Family Credit;

The 10p rate of income tax halves the marginal tax rate for 2.3 million people of which 1.7 million are low paid;

Reforms to National Insurance Contributions will remove 1 million low paid people from national insurance.

Taxes

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of its income an average family paid in direct and indirect taxes from 1970–71 to date; what estimate he has made of the proportion from 2000–01 to 2004–05; and on what assumptions these figures are based. [104278]

Dawn Primarolo: The available data are as follows:

Percentage of income paid in direct taxes by an average family

Year	Percentage
1970–71	18.8
1971–72	17.7
1972–73	17.5
1973–74	19.6
1974–75	22.2
1975–76	25.7
1976–77	24.6
1977–78	22.5
1978–79	20.9
1979–80	18.9
1980–81	20.8
1981–82	22.5
1982–83	22.8
1983–84	22.4
1984–85	22.0
1985–86	22.0
1986–87	21.9
1987–88	21.4
1988–89	20.7
1989–90	20.8
1990–91	20.8
1991–92	20.7
1992–93	20.2
1993–94	20.3
1994–95	21.7
1995–96	22.4
1996–97	21.5
1997–98	20.9
1998–99	21.0
1999–2000	20.4
2000–01	20.5
2001–02	18.9

Direct taxes are defined as Income Tax plus National Insurance minus Child Benefit. In line with long-standing convention, Child Benefit is treated as a negative component of income tax, making it consistent with child tax allowances prior to 1976. In order to provide data back to 1970 figures provided are for a one earner married couple on male mean earnings with two children.

No estimates of the tax burden at the detailed household level are available beyond 2001–02.

Estimating the impact of indirect taxes is imprecise as spending patterns vary widely between households with the same composition and income. The level of council tax payments will also vary depending on where families live.

VAT

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 352W, on VAT, what assessment he has made of the feasibility of making further reductions on the level of VAT charged on the installation of energy saving measures. [106696]

Dawn Primarolo: This Government have already introduced a reduced rate of 5 per cent., the lowest rate possible in EC law, for grant-funded installations of energy saving materials. EC law does not permit us to introduce a reduced rate for supplies of energy saving materials for do-it-yourself installation.

Windfall Tax

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to use all the receipts from the windfall tax by May 2002. [106797]

Dawn Primarolo: Table 4.1 of the 1999 Pre-Budget Report sets out the latest estimated allocation of the windfall tax receipts between different welfare-to-work programmes.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Welfare

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if a licensed establishment would need to obtain permission from his Department to cut the vocal cords of dogs. [106656]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Any procedure performed on a living animal at an establishment designated under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for an experimental or other scientific purpose that might have the effect of causing pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm to that animal would require a licence. This would include the cutting of the vocal cords of dogs. However, if that procedure was performed as an act of veterinary surgery, and not for an experimental or other scientific purpose, a licence under the 1986 Act would not be required.

Commercial dog breeding establishments and licensed pet shops, that sell dogs to the general public, are subject to licensing control under the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973 as amended by the Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Act 1999. The Home Office has issued detailed guidance to local authorities on the legislation but it has no role to play in enforcing this legislation, which is the responsibility of the local authorities.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many pigs were used in the xenotransplantation research carried out in the UK during (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999; [106659]

(2) how many deaths of primates there were in kidney and heart xenotransplantation research carried out in the UK during (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999; and what was the reason for each death. [106658]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My officials are seeking to collate these data but require more time. I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to review and improve the regulations concerning the standards of care and welfare of circus animals; and if he will make a statement; [106662]

(2) if he will make it his policy to require circus trainers to undertake formal courses in animal care and welfare; and if he will make a statement; [106664]

(3) if he intends to restrict circus trainers to the use of a positive reinforcement approach when training animals; and if he will make a statement; [106667]

(4) if he will take steps to require more precise record-keeping in respect of the welfare of individual circus animals; and if he will make a statement; [106663]

(5) if he will introduce standards of care and welfare for circus animals to ensure that all performance routines are extensions of natural behaviour and within the capability of the animal; and if he will make a statement. [106666]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government are considering recommendations about circus animals submitted by the Associate Parliamentary Group for Animal Welfare, at this time. We have not prepared new regulations or requirements concerning the training and welfare of such animals, but a draft code has been prepared by the Association of Circus Proprietors. This seeks to promote best practice on all aspects of the care of circus animals and, as part of that approach, it requires trainers to be suitably qualified and to use positive reinforcement methods. We are examining the draft.

There is likely to be little opportunity for Government legislation on the matter in the near future, but it is already an offence under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to cause any captive animal unnecessary suffering. Further protection is provided by the Performing Animals (Regulation) Act 1925. Under this, police and local authority officers have inspection powers and recourse to magistrates courts, which may make orders prohibiting or restricting the use of performing animals that have been cruelly treated when trained or exhibited.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the adequacy of controls on pet suppliers; and if he will make a statement. [106660]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We consider the existing controls to be adequate and have no plan to review them at the moment.

Pet shops are licensed by local authorities under the Pet Animals Act 1951 (as amended in 1983), and subject to licence conditions to safeguard the health and welfare of the animals in their charge. In addition, it is an offence under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to cause unnecessary suffering to any domestic or captive animal—this applies to pet shop keepers as to anyone else. Certain endangered animals imported for the pet trade are also protected under European Wildlife Regulations, which implement the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES). In addition, some exotic pets can only lawfully be sold to people subject to stringent licence controls imposed under the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976, and there are statutory restrictions on trade in United Kingdom wildlife species.

The Pet Care Trust has produced a code of practice for retailers of pets. This highlights key licence conditions, and includes a recommendation that, where appropriate, customers of pet shops should be given leaflets or other literature containing advice on how to care for the animals they have purchased.

Internet Betting

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans have been made by the Tote to establish an Internet-based betting centre offshore. [106705]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Pluto (Alderney) Limited, in which the Tote is a minority partner, has obtained a licence to operate an electronic betting site in Alderney; further steps remain under consideration.

Drug Use (Prisons)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of drug use have been detected in prisons for each year since 1997. [106580]

Mr. Boateng: The table gives figures on the number of samples that have tested positive for drugs under the mandatory drug testing programme for each financial year since 1997. The figures include the results of both random and targeted testing.

	Number of mandatory drug test samples testing positive
1997–98	20,346
1998–99	19,318
1999–2000[1]	11,658

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letters dated 23 September, 11 November and 16 December from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Munir Alam. [106836]

Mrs. Roche: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, wrote to my right hon. Friend today. I am sorry for the delay in replying.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letters dated 28 September, 11 November and 16 December from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Muzzamil Hussain. [106835]

Mr. Boateng: I offer unreserved apologies to my right hon. Friend for the failure to reply on time to his letters of 28 September, 11 November and 16 December with regard to Muzzamil Hussain a prisoner currently in Sudbury prison. Performance of this kind in relation to correspondence from hon. Members is, of course, unacceptable and I have taken steps to ensure that the circumstances of this particular case are not repeated.

In keeping with the sentiments expressed by my right hon. Friend in his correspondence, the prisoner concerned was released from Wealdstun prison on 28 September on compassionate grounds and again on 29 September 1999 to enable him to attend his father's funeral.

Alexander Schweidler

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what investigation his Department has undertaken into the war-time activities of Alexander Schweidler; [106828]

(2) when Alexander Schweidler received UK citizenship; and if he will review the information given in the application for naturalisation; [106827]

(3) what police investigations have taken place in relation to Alexander Schweidler under the War Crimes Act 1991; and if he will make a statement. [106829]

Mr. Straw: Mr. Schweidler was granted British citizenship in 1964. I understand that he died on 24 January. His case was one of just under 400 cases involving allegations of offences under the War Crimes Act 1991 investigated by the Metropolitan police service War Crimes Unit during the 1990s. Police investigations into allegations against Mr. Schweidler started in 1994. I understand there was insufficient evidence to support a prosecution. There have been no investigations separate to these.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to the draft of the Data Protection (Crown Appointments) Order 1999, for what reasons it is proposed to make personal data about the Provost of Eton, the Poet Laureate and the Astronomer Royal subject to an exemption. [106060]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Order exempts from the subject information provisions personal data processed for the purposes of assessing any person's suitability for certain offices. Like the other positions cited in the draft Order, these are Crown appointments. They typically involve communications between the Sovereign and the Prime Minister and involve information and judgments on individuals, often provided in confidence by third parties.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to the draft of the Data Protection (Processing of Sensitive Personal Data) Order 1999, for what reasons each exemption is necessary; if he will provide examples illustrating the distinction between public interest and substantial public interest wherever the latter term is used in the Order; what discussions he had on paragraph 5 of the Order with those authorities responsible for advising the Government on matters relating to genetics; and if he has notified the European Commission of the effect of the Order. [106058]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Each provision in the Schedule to the draft order is necessary to permit the processing of sensitive personal data in connection with the purpose or function referred to in the paragraph. Without such an order the first data protection principle in Schedule 1 of the Data Protection Act 1998 would prohibit the processing. As required by article 8.4 of the European Commission Data Protection Directive (95/46/EC), the processing may be carried out only if it is in the substantial public interest. There is no express reference to the substantial public interest in paragraphs in the Schedule to the draft order where the categories of processing described are considered always to be in the substantial public interest. Where there is such a reference, this is required to meet the requirements of article 8.4, as the general category of processing described may otherwise include some processing which may not be in the substantial public interest. The draft order has been prepared following a public consultation exercise and discussions with many organisations which process sensitive data and with the Data Protection Registrar. The Government have not expressly sought the views of genetics advisory bodies. The Government do not intend to inform the European Commission of the provision made in the draft order prior to it being considered by Parliament.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105864]

Mr. Straw: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 520W.

Ronnie Biggs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will grant an amnesty to Mr. Ronnie Biggs on grounds of the state of his health to enable him to return to the UK; and if he will make a statement. [106073]

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to grant any form of "amnesty" to Mr. Ronnie Biggs.

Police Salaries

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many employees in the police are in the salary bands (a) less than £10,000, (b) £10,000 to £12,500, (c) £12,500 to £15,000, (d) £15,000 to £17,500, (e) £17,500 to £20,000, (f) £20,000 to £22,500, (g) £22,500 to £25,000, (h) £25,000 to £30,000, (i) £30,000 to £35,000, (j) £35,000 to £40,000, (k) £40,000 to £45,000, (l) £45,000 to £50,000, (m) £50,000 to £55,000, (n) £55,000 to £60,000 and (o) more than £60,000. [106049]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is not held centrally on the numbers of police officers and police support staff paid within these specific salary bands. It is possible, however, to give the numbers of police officers serving in each rank, using figures correct at 31 March 1999, together with the range of salaries in each rank effective from 1 September 1999. The salary ranges given are for officers serving in provincial forces; officers serving in London receive additional allowances. The salary figures do not include overtime (where applicable) or other allowances.

As at 31 March 1999 the total number of police officers (including those at the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad) was 125,417 comprising:

51 at Chief Constable rank on a salary of £73,617 or above.

157 at Assistant Chief Constable rank on a salary range of £61,428 to £74,040.

1,241 at Superintendent rank on a salary range of £43,143 to £53,556.

6,039 at Inspector and 1,651 at Chief Inspector rank on a salary range of £32,862 to £39,687.

19,039 at Sergeant rank on a salary range of £25,407 to £29,634.

97,239 at Constable rank on a salary range of £16,635 to £26,325.

As at 31 March 1999 there were 53,031 full-time equivalent civilian police support staff (excluding traffic wardens). There is no centrally held data on the gradings and salaries of these staff.

Police Officers (Benefits)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the number of police officers who are in receipt of means-tested benefits; and if he will make a statement. [105605]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There is no data held centrally on the numbers of police officers who may be in receipt of means-tested benefits.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if it is his policy to encourage these with experience of other professions and with skills developed in other careers to join the police; and what assessment he has made of the adequacy of police rates of pay to attract such recruits; [105610]

(2) what account is taken of their prior skills and experience in setting the starting pay of new entrants to the police forces of England and Wales; [105607]

(3) what assessment he has made of the recruitment of mature individuals by the police and of the pay levels of such new entrants in their previous employment. [105614]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The recruitment of police officers is a matter for individual forces. There is no upper age limit for recruits, and applicants of all ages and background who fulfil the force entry criteria are encouraged to join. Clearly there is value in recruiting people with a wide range of skills and experience. Centrally held data are not available on the ages of recruits or their previous work experience.

Police rates of pay are contained within Police Regulations. There is an annual pay award for federated ranks, settled by a formula which keeps police pay in line with inflation. In 1998, pay was increased by 4.0 per cent. and in 1999 by 3.6 per cent.

Starting pay for recruits has been raised as a possible deterrent to applications from mature candidates who would be otherwise suitable for appointment. We are considering the issue and will refer it to the Police Negotiating Board if this seems warranted.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level of starting salary was for new recruits to the police forces of England and Wales in each of the last three years (a) in cash terms and (b) as a proportion of earnings. [105604]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The annual pay award for federated ranks is paid with effect from 1 September each year. The starting salary for appointments on probation (new recruits to the police service) in the year from 1 September 1997 was £15,438; it was £16,056 in the year from 1 September 1988 and £16,635 in the year from 1 September 1999.

At current rates of pay, a recruit will receive a pay rise to £18,612 on completion of 32 weeks initial training and a further rise, on completion of 2 years probation, to £19,713.

In 1997, the starting pay of appointments on probation (£15,438) was 80 per cent. of national average earnings; in 1998 (£16,056), 81 per cent. and in 1999 (£16,635), 79 per cent.

DEFENCE

HMS Glorious

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he took, following his oral statement of 28 January 1999, Official Report, columns 564–76, to ensure that contrary opinions to the official view of the HMS Glorious affair were fully taken into account in the latest revision of the official account; and if he will make a statement. [104751]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The circumstances surrounding the sinking of HMS Glorious have been most thoroughly researched within the MOD, during which opinions and interpretations from a wide variety of sources have been considered. In the course of these exhaustive investigations some new information has come to light which has enabled the MOD to make further minor revisions to the account already provided. This new information incudes the fact that it was the Commander in Chief Home Fleet who insisted that the Glorious should be diverted to Scapa Flow to conduct a court-martial, and not the captain of the carrier himself. In addition, since January 1999, the Naval Historical Branch has been able to track down the daily intelligence summaries which show that the late Sir Harry Hinsley's recollections, broadcast in the Channel 4 programme, were in error. These records, which in the original, are signed off by Sir Harry show that Bletchley Park did indeed report increased wireless signal traffic in the Western Baltic and the Kattegat during the relevant period, but that the assessment of experts at the time was that it was associated with U-boat activity, and not that of heavy German surface ships.

This extra information does not bring into question the conclusions arrived at in the MOD paper reviewed by my predecessor after the adjournment debate in this House in January last year. I shall arrange for a copy of the revised paper, incorporating these slight amendments to be placed in the Library of the House.

Parachute Regiment

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current strength of each of the battalions of the Parachute Regiment. [106564]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The current UK trained strength for each of the three Regular parachute battalions and the Territorial Army battalion, as at 1 December 1999, is shown in the table.

Battalion	Trained strength
1 Para[1]	538
2 Para[1]	[2]531
3 Para[1]	[3]644
4 Para (V)	[4]387

[1] The figures are for UK Trained Army Personnel only, and exclude Locally Employed personnel, Royal Irish (Home Service) personnel, Reservists mobilised for duties associated with Bosnia, Full-time Reserve Service personnel, and Gurkhas.

[2] Strength of 2 Para does not include the Gurkha Reinforcement Company (GRC) that is currently attached to it.

[3] 3 Para are currently on an operational tour which is reflected in their increased numbers.

[4] On 1 July 1999, 4 and 10 Para merged to form a new 4 Para (V).

Departmental Staff

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the armed forces were (a) registered disabled, (b) women, (c) from ethnic minorities and (d) from (i) independent, (ii) grammar and (iii) other schools in (1) 1970, (2) 1979, (3) 1989 and (4) 1999. [106760]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as follows:

(a) disabled people; I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) on 12 January 1998, Official Report, column 132W, and the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 23 July 1999, Official Report, columns 694–95W.

(b) women; The percentage of serving women in the Armed Forces, as at 1 April for each of the years requested, were:

	Percentage
1970	3.80
1979	4.86
1989	5.22
1999	7.74

(c) ethnic minorities; In my reply to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on 21 July 1997, Official Report, column 400W, I stated that a new management-led, self-classification survey of the ethnic origin of serving personnel was introduced in July 1996. I also stated that prior to that date, records could not be relied on. On 1 April 1999, 1.1 per cent. of the Armed Forces were from ethnic minorities.

(d) education backgrounds; The information is not available in the form requested. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) on 10 January 2000, Official Report, columns 89–90W, which gave an estimated breakdown of the education background of Army officer cadets at the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst for each of the last five financial years. With regard to the Naval Service and the RAF, an estimated breakdown of the education background of the officers accepted for training (by percentage) for each of the last financial years (where known) is:

	Independent	State	Others
Naval Service
1994–95	29	71	n/k

Note:
Since 1997–98, the RAF no longer record the type of secondary school that officer candidates have attended, but only the last educational establishment that they had been to which, in most cases, is a university or other college.

The education background of serving other ranks is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy regarding equal opportunities for women, disabled people, ethnic minorities and those from social classes IIIM, IV and V in the armed forces. [106573]

Mr. Spellar: The Armed Forces Equal Opportunities goal, published in March 1999, is to achieve universal acceptance and application of a working environment free from harassment, intimidation and unlawful discrimination, in which all have equal opportunity, consistent with our legal obligations, to realise their full potential in contributing to the maintenance and enhancement of operational effectiveness. The armed forces respect and value every individual's unique contribution, irrespective of their race, ethnic origin, religion or gender and without reference to social background or sexual orientation.

Members of the armed forces are exempt from the employment provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Disability or a history of disability is not compatible with the need for a combat effective fighting force, able to undertake a full range of military operations anywhere in the world. Service personnel disabled on duty are, depending on circumstances, allowed to continue to serve as long as such service will not undermine overall combat effectiveness. This approach reflects the Services' duty of care to the individual and allows them to benefit from the individual's experience and ensures a return on their training investment.

Depleted Uranium

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information British forces in Kosovo have given to the Kosovar population about measures to reduce exposure to the insoluble radioactive alpha-particles given off by depleted uranium dust. [106925]

Mr. Spellar: The health risks from DU have been assessed as low. It is unlikely that anyone other than those in an armoured vehicle penetrated by a DU projectile, or those spending prolonged periods within a few tens of metres of the point at which a DU penetrator had impacted with a hard target, would be exposed to large enough quantities of particulate material for them to receive a radiation dose greater than 20–30 millisieverts. For comparison purposes, the UK statutory annual dose limit for employees aged 18 years and over is 50 millisieverts. Consequently, I understand that no specific advice has been promulgated by UNMIK for civilians in Kosovo.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information Her Majesty's Government have issued to the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia about the radioactive and chemical toxicity of depleted uranium weapons. [106926]

Mr. Spellar: None. We are not aware of anyone in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia who might have been exposed to possible contamination from depleted uranium munitions.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the US Department of Defense has informed his Department of the location of areas in (a) Serbia and (b) Kosovo which are contaminated with depleted uranium as a result of NATO bombing; [106930]

(2) if he will list the areas believed to be contaminated by depleted uranium munitions dropped during the NATO bombing of Kosovo and Serbia. [106929]

Mr. Spellar: The UN Secretary General has requested that NATO make available more detailed information concerning the use of Depleted Uranium (DU) rounds in Kosovo, including locations of use. NATO staff are currently preparing this detailed information for release to the United Nations. I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the Government have to decontaminate those areas in the former Yugoslavia affected by depleted uranium munitions. [106927]

Mr. Spellar: Reconstruction and remediation is primarily a matter for civil agencies within the international community rather than specifically for NATO or the MOD. However, British forces have played their part—particularly in the clearance of unexploded ordnance.

The UN report on the consequences for the environment of the Kosovo conflict was published on 5 October 1999. Preliminary radiation measures were taken from destroyed military vehicles and from around the heavily damaged Police Station and Post Office in Pristina. No indications of DU contamination were found, although the report acknowledges that this does not exclude the possibility of DU-contaminated areas elsewhere in Kosovo.

Kosovo

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British personnel are posted to operate Pristina airfield in Kosovo, broken down where appropriate (a) by military service and rank, (b) by Civil Service grade and (c) in the case of contractors, by company. [107088]

Mr. Spellar: As at 25 January, there were 196 UK service personnel directly involved in the operation of the airfield at Pristina. Of these, 18 were RAF officers, 34 were RAF senior non-commissioned officers, 143 were RAF other ranks and one was an Army other rank. There are no UK based civil servants or contractor employees directly involved in the operation of the airfield.

Underspends

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) for what reasons there were underspends in subsections (a) A2 and (b) B2, C2, D2, E2, F2, G2, H2 and J2 of the latest systems procurement and research account; [107086]

(2) for what reasons there were underspends in subsections (a) A2, B2 and C3 and (b) C2 of the latest Logistics Service Account; [107084]

(3) for what reasons there were underspends in subsections (a) A2, B2, C2, C4, E2, G2, H2, H3, H4, I4 and (b) B3, D2, D3, F2, F3 and I2 of the latest Operational and Support Costs Account. [107085]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Falklands

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on naval patrols in the Falkland Islands. [107247]

Mr. Spellar: Naval patrols in the Falkland Islands are undertaken by the Falkland Islands Guard Ship (currently HMS Somerset) and a Castle class Offshore Patrol Vessel (currently HMS Dumbarton Castle) supported by a Royal Fleet Auxiliary Vessel (currently RFA Grey Rover). The Guardship maintains a presence in the Falkland Islands area for most of the year, but can, on occasions, be held at longer notice to allow the ship to carry out other activities elsewhere. Other Naval assets also deploy to the area from time to time.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to withdraw HMS Dumbarton Castle from the Falklands; and if he will make a statement. [107248]

Mr. Spellar: We have no plans to withdraw HMS Dumbarton Castle from the Falkland Islands.

Medical Services

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his recent letter to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, on medical services in the Forces, whether it was with his authority that a senior Admiralty officer made a statement on the condition of medical services in the Navy; and if he will make a statement. [107028]

Mr. Spellar: I have not authorised any senior naval officer to make a statement on medical services in the Royal Navy, nor have I been asked to do so. This Government have long recognised the problems we inherited in the Defence Medical Services (DMS), the most significant of which is the shortage of manpower. We are committed to ensuring that our Armed Forces have the medical support they require and, following the Strategic Defence Review, we have made an additional £140 million available for the DMS over the four years to 2001–02 for medical equipment and personnel. In December 1998, we announced a new strategy for the DMS, covering a range of measures, a key element of which is the creation of a Centre for Defence Medicine (CDM). The University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust has been selected as the host Trust for the Centre which we plan to open in April 2001. As well as being the professional focus for the DMS, and providing clinical services, the CDM will be an important centre for military training and research and we believe it will encourage recruitment and retention of DMS personnel.

Northern Ireland

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is his policy on the carrying of weapons for personal protection by members of the Territorial Army in Northern Ireland; [107138]

(2) how many members of the Territorial Army and Reserve forces have been (a) killed and (b) attacked by terrorists in Northern Ireland in the last 20 years; [107140]

(3) under what circumstances Territorial Army units from Northern Ireland are required to relinquish their weapons when undertaking training exercises in Scotland. [107139]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Nimrod Pilots

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many serving RAF pilots are available and trained in date to fly the Nimrod aircraft. [107046]

Mr. Spellar: As at 25 January, there are 73 Nimrod pilots who are qualified and current. This figure is made up of 65 Nimrod MR2 pilots and eight Nimrod R1 pilots.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration (Un-opened Mail)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the earliest postmarked date of unopened mail in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate on (a) 1 November 1999, (b) 1 December 1999 and (c) 1 January 2000; and how many items of mail remained unopened on each date. [105674]

Mrs. Roche: Significant and continuing improvements have been made in the handling of mail in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate.

Directly addressed applications for variation of leave are opened when they are initially processed, which now takes place within three days of receipt. The earliest postmarked dates and numbers of unopened items of this category of mail were as follows on the dates specified:

Date	Earliest postmark	Unopened items
1 November 1999	17 September 1999	12,000
1 December 1999	1 October 1999	7,500
1 January 2000	20 December 1999	3,500

Information on the postmarked dates of mail addressed to the Travel Documents Section is not available, but the numbers of unopened items were as follows.

Date	Unopened items
1 November 1999	1,573
1 December 1999	897
1 January 2000	461

Information on the unopened items and earliest postmarks of mail that was not directly addressed at the dates specified is not available. Since 1 November 1999, all mail which is not directly addressed has been sent to a Document Management Centre, where it is opened and sent to the correct location. All such mail items are currently opened and despatched on the date of receipt.

Departmental Fees

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the fees his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies collect; how much has been raised or it is anticipated will be raised from each of these fees from 1989–90 to 2004–05; and which of these fees count as negative expenditure. [105999]

Mr. Straw: The fees received in years for which the information is readily available and for which reasonable future estimates can be made are given in the table.

Fee receipts: Home Office and associated public bodies

Naturalisation Applications

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in each of the last five years, how many applications for naturalisation were (a) made, (b) decided on and (c) outstanding at the year end; and what was the average time taken to process an application in each year. [106046]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested for naturalisation applications is given in the table.

1995	19,736	31,143	[1]n/a	13.6

[1] Information is not available in the form requested, as applications are not always completed in the year of receipt.

Currency Counterfeiting

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on Council Decision 1999/C 322/04 (C322 of 10 November 1999), with reference to the (a) manner of legislative implementation in the United Kingdom and (b) consequences for extradition arrangements; [106403]

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on UK law of the German initiative on increasing penal sanctions against counterfeiting the euro, set out in document 11302/99 of 5 October 1999; what court of law would try UK cases; and what supreme court would take final appeals. [106429]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An amended version of Germany's initiative on increasing penal sanctions against counterfeiting the Euro was "agreed in substance" at the Justice and Home Affairs Council in December. The text agreed was similar to that deposited for scrutiny with the House in November (reference: 12585/99). The text did not receive final approval at the Council because a number of member states, including the United Kingdom, held parliamentary scrutiny reservations, and because the European Parliament had not yet given its opinion. The Council hopes to adopt the Framework Decision in March.

The draft Framework Decision, as provisionally agreed in December, contains three main legislative implications for the United Kingdom. First, the United Kingdom would be required to ensure that pre-circulation Euro notes and coins are covered by United Kingdom legislation. This requirement would be met by Part I of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 in relation to pre-circulation Euro notes, and Part II of the 1981 Act in relation to pre-circulation Euro coins. The Forgery and Counterfeiting (Protected Coins) Order (1999) designates Euro coins as protected coins within the meaning of Section 27(1) of the 1981 Act. Second, the United Kingdom would be required to take jurisdiction over counterfeiting offences committed in whole or in part within the United Kingdom's jurisdiction. The Government intend to meet this requirement through an amendment to Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1993. Finally, should the United Kingdom adopt the Euro, the United Kingdom would be required to take universal jurisdiction for cases of counterfeiting of the Euro (i.e. to empower United Kingdom courts to try offences of counterfeiting of the Euro which had been committed anywhere in the world).

Cases of counterfeiting of the Euro within the United Kingdom's jurisdiction, like all other criminal offences, would be tried by United Kingdom courts, and the normal avenues of appeal would apply. I do not expect the draft Framework Decision to have any consequences for the United Kingdom's extradition arrangements.

Schengen Information System

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which delegation has stated its objection to the UK partial participation in the Schengen Information System; and if he will make a statement. [106423]

Mrs. Roche: It is not our practice to disclose the negotiating positions of member states. Following discussion at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 3 December of the United Kingdom's application to participate in parts of the Schengen acquis, no objections remain to the United Kingdom's partial participation in the Schengen Information System.

Prison Service

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria govern decisions by the Prison Service to make out-of-court settlements; and what changes there have been to these criteria in the last 10 years. [106141]

Mr. Boateng: In deciding to settle out-of-court, the Prison Service will take professional advice as to the likelihood and financial implications of the claim succeeding, and will normally agree to settle out-of-court those cases where it considers the claim is likely to succeed and the proposed settlement figure is at or below the level a court is likely to award. Savings in costs are also taken into account, as are any wider operational or public policy implications of the case.

This approach has not changed over the last 10 years, but in handling claims the Prison Service has of course taken into account developments in the law and the civil justice system. The Woolf reforms to civil justice encourage out of court settlements.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how often the Prison Service has made out-of-court settlements; and how much was paid, in each case, in each year since 1990. [106142]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average weekly cost per inmate of imprisonment in each category of prison for each year since 1990. [106112]

Mr. Boateng: The average weekly cost per prisoner in each category of prison is listed in the tables in cash terms and at 1992–1993 prices, when the Prison Service became an Executive Agency. Data have been obtained from the Prison Service Annual Reports and Accounts.

Prisoners (Self-harm)

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of self-harm were recorded by people held in (a) court cells and (b) on prison escort, in each of the last five years. [106113]

Mr. Boateng: Information systems used by the Prison Service do not allow a differentiation between incidents of self-harm committed by people in court cells and on prison escort. The information available on self-harm incidents of people while on prison escort undertaken by private sector companies acting under contract to the Prison Service is the total number reported to the incident management support unit (IMSU) in Prison Service headquarters. These figures are given in the table.

Care should be taken when interpreting the data because, although the majority of incidents of self-harm occur while in court, some incidents do take place in cellular vehicles. In addition, it should be noted that responsibility for the escorting of prisoners to and from court was progressively contracted out in England and Wales between April 1993 and August 1997. Consequently, the figures for 1995–96 and 1996–97 are low because incidents involving prisoners under escort by prison staff would have been recorded against the establishment involved, while those relating to prisoners in police custody would have been collected locally.

Reported incidents of self-harm by people while on prison escort 1995–96 to 1999–2000

Year	Total
1995–96	16
1996–97	57
1997–98	145
1998–99	156
1999–2000[1]	184

[1] As at 19 January 1999

Notes:

1. These data are derived from information provided by escort contract monitors to the Incident Management Support Unit (IMSU) in Prison Service Headquarters.
2. Incidents do not necessarily equate to numbers of prisoners as an individual prisoner may self-harm on more than one occasion.
3. Statistics on self-harm are collated on a financial year basis.

Prison Mother and Baby Units

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the weekly cost of accommodating an inmate in each of the mother and baby units in the United Kingdom. [106143]

Mr. Boateng: At present no separate budget is allocated to the mother and baby units. The cost of running the unit is met from the individual establishment's central budget. Mother and baby units (MBUs), do not have a standard cost as the physical accommodation offered is different in each one. Additionally, the regimes offered differ from prison to prison depending on its security category and its function within the female estate. The information requested is given in the table.

	Prisoner places	Open/closed	Weekly cost per prisoner place on MBUs (£)

Prison Suicides

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides of prisoners have occurred (a) in prisons and (b) while on escort from prisons; and if he will indicate the company responsible for the escort at the time in each of the last five years. [106114]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table.

Notes:

1. The term employed by the Prison Service in England and Wales to refer to an apparent suicide is "self-inflicted death". This is broader than the term suicide and includes all those deaths where it is clear that the person has acted specifically to take his/her own life. It is not restricted to the official verdict from the Coroner's inquest, where verdicts of "suicide", "open" or "misadventure" may be recorded in cases where there was doubt about a person's intent to end their life.
2. Self-inflicted deaths while on escort from prisons are included in the overall annual figures shown in the table.

Prison Places

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many places have been made available in each new prison opened since 1990. [106139]

Mr. Boateng: Since 1990, 20 new prisons have opened. These are listed in the table along with the calendar year of opening and the number of prisoner places available on 17 December 1999, the latest date for which official figures are available. The figure for Forest Bank, which opened last week, is provisional.

EU Mutual Assistance Convention

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on Article 18 of the Draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, between the member states of the European Union, with special reference to the legal status of UK amendments and declarations. [106395]

Mr. Charles Clarke: On 2 December 1999 the Justice and Home Affairs Council agreed a legally-binding Declaration on the scope of Article 18 of the draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the member states of the European Union. This makes clear that, in the United Kingdom, Article 18 will apply to interception warrants issued by the Secretary of State to the Police Service and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for the purpose of the detection of serious crime. The Declaration also applies Article 18 to interception warrants issued to the Security Service for this purpose (in accordance with its remit under the Security Service Act 1996).

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what number of intercepts his Department estimates will be requested annually, by member states, under the Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters; and if he will break down that estimate by category of criminal activity. [106397]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is not possible to provide a meaningful estimate of the number or category of requests since this will be determined by the requirements of other member states once the draft Convention is agreed and ratified. However, any request for mutual legal assistance to intercept the communications of a person in the United Kingdom will need to meet the criteria for issuing a warrant for the purpose of the prevention or detection of serious crime under the United Kingdom's legislation on interception of communications.

Serious crime is defined in the Interception of Communications Act 1985 as conduct which, if it took place in the United Kingdom, would constitute one or more offences if, and only if:

> it involves the use of violence, results in substantial financial gain or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose; or > the offence or one of the offences is an offence for which a person who has attained the age of twenty-one and has no previous convictions could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of three years or more.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will deposit the Commission paper on Article 17 of the Draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, which was examined by the Article 36 Committee on 9 and 10 November 1999, in the Library; and if he will make a statement on the (a) role and (b) composition of the Committee. [106396]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I am depositing the paper produced by representatives of the European Commission in the Library.

The Article 36 Committee was established under Article 36 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU) as a co-ordinating body. The committee's terms of reference are limited to police (including customs) and judicial co-operation in criminal matters. It gives opinions for the attention of the Justice and Home Affairs Council and (with COREPER) contributes to preparation of Council discussions. The committee is composed of senior officials of the member states and the European Commission.

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on what date Mr. Winser ACC Cambridge Constabulary chaired the first meeting of the working group into the National Firearms Database set up under the Association of Chief Officers Sub-committee (group) on the administration of firearms licensing; [106416]

(2) if he will place in the Library copies held by his Department of all documents, letters, agendas and minutes provided by the Association of Chief Officers Sub-committee (group) on the administration of firearms licensing since 1996; [106412]

(3) if he will place in the Library a copy of the names of the current membership of the Association of Chief Officers Sub-committee (group) on the administration of firearms licensing, giving the names of their forces and the dates on which they took up positions on that committee. [106413]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The arrangements made for appointing members and for managing and publishing the work of the Sub-committee on the Administration of Firearms and Explosives Licensing and any associated working groups are matters for the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place copies in the Library of the reports compiled by the PNC directorate into the resource and financing implications of the National Firearms Database computerisation. [106417]

Mr. Charles Clarke: A realistic estimate of the resource and finance implications for this database can be compiled only when a detailed impact assessment has been completed. The Police Information Technology Organisation plans to begin work on this assessment in February and to complete it in April. It will be placed in the Library as soon as it is available.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to the implementation of section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 (a) who is responsible for the problem, (b) who are the stakeholders and (c) what are the success criteria; and if he will make a statement. [106419]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As indicated in the reply I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 370W, the Act does not specify the person or organisation which is to provide the central register referred to in section 39. When completed, the register will form part of the PHOENIX database and the principal stakeholders will be the police service and the Police National Computer Directorate. The success criteria will be the establishment of a computer system accessible on-line to all police forces and containing details of all persons who have applied for a firearm or shotgun certificate or to whom a firearm or shotgun certificate has been granted or whose certificate has been renewed. It is not possible at this stage to give a firm date but it is hoped that the system will be up and running by the summer of 2001.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy in the Library of the user requirement of the Central National Firearms Database, indicating the date when it was drafted. [106415]

Mr. Charles Clarke: A copy of the user requirement was placed in the Library in March 1999 shortly after it was finalised.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the dates of all meetings attended by Mr. Paul Pugh of the Home Office OPPU and his deputies since January 1997 concerning the proposed implementation of the computerisation of the National Firearms Database requirement contained in section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997; and if he will place copies of all such documents produced and discussed in the Library. [106414]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Apart from a presentation which was given by the Police National Computer Directorate at Hendon on 11 February 1997, no staff of the Operational Policing Policy Unit (OPPU) have attended specific meetings to discuss the proposed implementation of the database. The initial work to establish the database was undertaken by a working group set up under the auspices of the Association of Chief Police Officers Sub-Committee on the Administration of Firearms and Explosives Licensing, on which OPPU is not represented. We have no plans to place ephemeral papers considered by the group in the Library, but copies of final documents such as the user requirement and detailed impact assessment have been or will be made available in this way.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes involving firearms were committed in each of the past 10 years. [106313]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested was published in an Annexe to the statistical bulletin "Firearm Certificate Statistics, England and Wales 1998" on 26 November 1999. A copy is in the Library.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the (a) software and (b) hardware systems used by the (a) City of London, (b) Cumbria, (c) Dorset, (d) Humberside, (e) Norfolk and (f) West Mercia police forces to hold the register of privately held firearms and persons holding firearms certificates; and if he will place a copy of the functional specification and user guide of each system in the Library. [106768]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As indicated in my reply of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 370W, the functional specifications and user guides of systems used by the police to record details of firearm certificate holders are not held centrally.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 370W, on firearms what steps he (a) has taken and (b) is taking to ensure full compliance with section 39 of the Firearms Amendment Act 1997; for what reasons the system is not in full operation; and if it has been piloted. [106772]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Development of the national firearms database currently features in the Police Information Technology Organisation's business plan for 2000–01. Development could not have begun earlier because the resources available were required for projects of even higher priority. It has not been piloted and the next step is to carry out a detailed impact assessment which should be completed in April. It is not possible to give a firm implementation date at this stage but it is hoped that the system will be in place by the summer of 2001. I propose to monitor the situation carefully.

Mike Tyson

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors he took into account in deciding to permit Mr. Mike Tyson to enter the United Kingdom on compassionate grounds. [106457]

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the compassionate grounds for exempting Mr. Mike Tyson from refusal of entry to the UK. [106651]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 25 January 2000]: There were no compassionate grounds in relation to Mr. Tyson which affected my decision to admit him. In reaching my decision one of the factors to which I gave particular weight was the lack of consistency in the effect of the Immigration Rules. I also considered the likely effect of cancellation of the fight on those who had already purchased tickets and smaller enterprises and individuals who were probably least able to bear any losses.

I weighted these factors against the nature and seriousness of Mr. Tyson's convictions and I decided on balance that the exceptional circumstances of this case were such that Mr. Tyson should be granted entry solely for the purpose of participating in the scheduled sporting event. This decision was made in accordance with the Immigration Act 1971 and the Immigration Rules.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) of 18 January 2000, Official Report, columns 368–69W, on Mr. Mike Tyson, if he will list the companies and individuals with a direct or indirect interest in the promotion, whose comments formed part of the representations from Mr. Frank Warren. [106975]

Mr. Straw: In addition to his own letter, Mr. Warren's representations to the Immigration Service of 12 January consisted of 25 pages of copies of requests for media accreditation for the boxing match and 32 other letters from companies and individuals, either associated with the sports and leisure industry or the sport of boxing, including boxers due to fight in Manchester on 29 January.

As a matter of practice, representations made to the Immigration and Nationality Department about individual cases are treated in confidence.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 417W, what representations he received from BSkyB (a) directly and (b) indirectly in respect of Mr. Mike Tyson's application to enter the country. [106977]

Mr. Straw: Representations were submitted to the Immigration Service by Mr. Frank Warren, the promoter of the event. He referred in these representations to the investment in the promotion by television networks including Showtime in the United States of America and BSkyB in this country. I considered these factors but I did not regard them as relevant to the decision I took.

In reaching my decision to admit Mr. Tyson one of the factors to which I gave most particular weight was the lack of consistency in the effect of the relevant Immigration Rule, as well as the likely effect of cancellation of the fight on those who had already purchased tickets and smaller enterprises and individuals who were probably least able to bear any losses.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) the number of officers involved in policing the visit of Mr. Mike Tyson to Brixton, (b) the cost of policing Mr. Tyson's visit and (c) how much he has asked Mr. Tyson and his promoters to contribute towards that cost. [107081]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that a total of 82 police officers were involved in policing the visit of Mike Tyson to Brixton on 21 January. The net additional manpower costs of these officers was approximately £9,700. I understand that the Lambeth borough Commander did not regard the policing of this event as a "special service" and therefore did not seek a contribution from Mr. Tyson or his promoters.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were on duty in Brixton at 3 p.m. on (a) 14 January, (b) 21 January and (c) 15 January; and if he will make a statement. [107080]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the number of uniformed officers available for routine patrol duties in Brixton at 3pm on these dates were as follows: (a) 14 January, 56; (b) 21 January, 25 with another 82 officers specifically deployed for the policing of the visit of Mike Tyson; (c) 15 January, 42.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations his Department has held with the Scottish Executive on the (a) dispersal of asylum seekers and (b) designation of reception zones. [107074]

Mrs. Roche: Officials in my Department have kept in regular contact with officials in the Scottish Executive to discuss a range of issues concerning the dispersal programme for asylum seekers.

Hunting (Committee of Inquiry)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who appointed the members of the Committee of Inquiry into the Impact of Hunting with Dogs in England and Wales. [106770]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The members of the Committee of Inquiry were appointed by my right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary, following consultation with the noble Lord Burns, the chairman of the inquiry team.

Police Funding

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he plans to allocate police grant in 2000–01; and what the final funding allocations for police authorities will be for that year. [107555]

Mr. Straw: I have today, laid before the House, the Police Grant Report (England and Wales) 2000–01 (HC 169). The Report sets out my determination for 2000–01 of the aggregate amount of grants that I propose to pay under section 46(2) of the Police Act 1996, and the amount to be paid to each police authority including the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District.

Funding allocations for each police authority in England for 2000–01 are set out in the table. The table also shows allocations approved by Parliament for 1999–2000. Final funding allocations for police authorities in Wales will be announced shortly when the National Assembly for Wales publishes Standard Spending Assessment determinations for Welsh authorities.

Security Services

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will respond to the Home Affairs Committee's Third report of Session 1998–99 on the Accountability of the Security Service; and if he will make a statement. [107649]

Mr. Straw: The Government will respond tomorrow by way of a Command Paper.

Passports

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the full economic unit cost performance of the UK Passport Agency's passport unit in (a) actual and (b) real terms for (i) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02. [107078]

Mrs. Roche: The latest estimate of the Passport Agency's actual full economic unit cost, as indicated in Annexe B of the Passport Agency's Corporate and Business Plan 1999–2002 which was published on 6 December 1990, is shown in the table. The real terms figures are at 1999–2000 prices.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his objective that passport applications should in future be available at the Passport Agency's public counters; and what is his timetable for attaining that objective. [107073]

Mrs. Roche: Passport applications can already be made at the public counters of individual passport offices. All the Passport Agency's public counter areas also have a stock of application forms, available to customers.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a tiered service for passport applicants of the kind outlined by the Chief Executive of the Passport Agency on pages 2 and 3 of "A Blueprint for the Future". [107071]

Mrs. Roche: Subject to the results of market research the Passport Agency plans to introduce, by early 2001, a fast track service for people applying through the Passport Agency's partners and at counters, and a premium service, for counter service callers only, to meet urgent travel requirements.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the level of productivity of the Passport Agency's PASS system will match that of the PIMIS system. [107075]

Mrs. Roche: Passport Application Support System (PASS) productivity should match that of the Passport Issuing and Management Information System (PIMIS) by this summer.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a version of the table showing the Passport Agency's income and expenditure printed in page 19, paragraph 5.3 of the Agency's current corporate and business plan which takes account of the income and expenditure relating to the proposed new Passport Office in Durham. [107076]

Mrs. Roche: The table showing the Passport Agency's income and expenditure which is printed in page 19, paragraph 5.3 of the Agency's Corporate and Business plans 1999–02 already takes account of the income and expenditure relating to the proposed new passport office in Durham.

Integrated Casework Directive

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the figures for the analysis of the work of the Integrated Casework Directorate which he placed in the Library in graph form as part of his answer of 13 December 2000, Official Report, column 1W, on the Integrated Casework Directive; and if he will update those figures to the present date. [107091]

Mrs. Roche: I have placed in the Library a table giving a breakdown of the weekly output of the Integrated Casework Directorate (ICD) in the four categories against which the recovery of the ICD's business would be measured in the first instance, from 1 January 1999 to the week ending 14 January 2000.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Sir Herman Ouseley will retire as Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality; and when he will announce the name of his successor. [107072]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Sir Herman Ousely is scheduled to retire as Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality on 31 January 2000. My right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary, expects to announce his successor shortly.

UK Passport Agency (Sick Leave)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average number of days lost through sickness in the Passport Agency in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) in each month of 1999. [107077]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is set out in the table.

Average sick absence per employee (working days)

Year	Average number of days
1997	13.76
1998	12.96
1999	12.60

The agency has reduced its sickness absence rate by nearly 14 per cent. since 1996.

The monthly breakdown for 1999 is as follows:

	Percentage
January	1.4
February	1.1
March	1.1
April	0.8
May	1.0
June	0.8
July	0.7
August	1.0
September	1.1

November	1.5
December	0.9

Family Reunification Directive

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact on the United Kingdom's immigration policy of the draft EC Directive on family reunification; and if he will make a statement on Government policy on that draft directive. [107070]

Mrs. Roche: The Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaties by the Treaty of Amsterdam, provides that the United Kingdom is bound by Community measures adopted under Title IV only where it opts in to any measure. The Government will decide whether to opt in to the draft Directive on family reunification within three months of the formal publication of the proposal and will inform Parliament accordingly. The Government's Explanatory Memorandum on the proposal, submitted for scrutiny on 10 January, provides an initial analysis of the impact of the draft Directive on United Kingdom law were the United Kingdom to opt in to this measure.

Indirect Discrimination

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the Government's policy is on indirect discrimination; and if he will make a statement. [107345]

Mr. Straw: The Government are committed to achieving a step change in race equality in this country. The Race Relations (Amendment) Bill is part of our programme to ensure that the public sector sets the pace in this drive towards equality. We want to send the clearest possible message that discrimination is not acceptable and will not be tolerated. The Government are, therefore, proposing two changes to strengthen the provisions of the Bill.

First, after very careful deliberation we have decided to extend the indirect discrimination provisions of the Race Relations Act 1976 to the functions of public authorities to be newly caught by the Act and we will bring forward an amendment to provide for that. The Government have always been in favour of this in principle, but were concerned to ensure that such a provision would be effective without leaving public bodies open to routine legal challenge in circumstances where their policies were entirely proper. Since the Bill was published, however, we have listened carefully to the arguments put forward about the issue and have concluded that, on balance, the risk of spurious challenge is outweighed by the principle of including indirect discrimination in respect of public sector functions in the Bill.

Direct and Indirect racial discrimination is already prohibited under the Race Relations Act 1976 in the fields of employment, training, education, housing and the provision of goods, facilities and services in respect of the public and private sector. The Act is already being extended by the Bill to new fields in the public sector which have previously been determined by case law not to be a "service" and to which prohibitions on direct or indirect discrimination did not, therefore, apply. The Act will now extend to areas such as the implementation of central and local government's regulatory, economic and social policies and law enforcement in respect of indirect discrimination as well.

Secondly, the Government also see the promotion of equality as a positive way of eliminating unjustifiable indirect discrimination in these and other fields. Our setting of targets for ethnic minority recruitment, retention and promotion and our guidelines for mainstreaming race equality into policy development and implementation are examples. We are already committed to placing the promotion of equality by public bodies on a statutory footing. We will reinforce that commitment by bringing forward a Government amendment to the Race Relations (Amendment) Bill to enshrine the principle on the face of the Bill as a positive duty, leaving room for consultation on how the duty will operate in practice and how it will be enforced.

The amendments will be brought forward at Commons Committee stage. We are meanwhile considering whether there should be any procedural safeguards consistent with the principle of non-discrimination.

Attendance Centres

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reform attendance centres. [107346]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In January last year, we set up a small working group, including attendance centre representatives and other experts, to consider the centres' future operation. It made a number of useful proposals for reform of their management and operation, including developing more individual programmes to tackle offending problems.

For the 84 junior attendance centres, we have decided to combine reforms on these lines with organisational changes to match the philosophy of the youth justice reforms launched in the Government's November 1997 White Paper, "No More Excuses—A New Approach to Tackling Youth Crime in England and Wales".

From April 2000, the Youth Justice Board for England and Wales will take over from the Home Office the central responsibility for commissioning and funding junior attendance centres. The Board will invite youth offending teams to start taking over as local agents for these centres from April, that is generally from chief officers of police. Close liaison with the police will continue, through police membership of youth offending teams. The local changes will be made first in a number of pilot areas. They will also be invited to develop the centres' programmes in line with the working group's principles, and liaise with the courts to ensure centres play an appropriate role in the new range of youth justice disposals.

Senior attendance centres, which cater mainly for offenders aged 18 to 24, will remain the responsibility of the Home Office nationally and the police locally. Their future operation will be reviewed in the context of the adult sentencing framework.

Police Statistics

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the total number of police officers in (a) Essex and (b) Southend in (i) 1995, (ii) 1996, (iii) 1997, (iv) 1998 and (v) 1999. [107270]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information available is set out in the table. The data about the number of officers in the Southend Division have been provided by the Chief Constable of Essex. The force is not able to provide figures for 1995 and 1996.

Essex police and Southend division police numbers—1995 to 1999

Fine Defaulters

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the pilot schemes to test the alternatives to custody for fine defaulters which were provided by the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997. [107069]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Measures in the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 which allow courts to impose a community service order, a curfew order or disqualification from driving on fine defaulters instead of sending them to prison are being piloted in Norfolk and Greater Manchester. A report on the findings from the pilots will be published soon and a decision taken over whether or not to make the provisions available nationally. A Research Finding detailing interim findings was published last year evaluating the use of these measures during 1998.

Home Detention Curfew Scheme

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of sentence (a) received and (b) served by prisoners released under the Home Detention Curfew scheme in 1999. [107031]

Mr. Boateng: The average sentence length of those released under the Home Detention Curfew scheme in 1999 was 14.5 months, of which 5.7 months (39 per cent.), including time on remand, was served before release.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criminal offences were committed by prisoners released under the Home Detention Curfew Scheme in 1999; and how many prisoners convicted of each type of offence were released. [107036]

Mr. Boateng: The original offences committed by prisoners released under the Home Detention Curfew scheme in 1999, and the estimated number (to the nearest hundred) of prisoners convicted of each type of offence who were released, are shown in the table.

	Number
Violence	2,600
Robbery	600
Burglary	1,500
Theft and handling	2,000
Fraud and forgery	1,300
Drugs	2,400
Other	4,500
Total	14,900

Crown Court Appeals

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the average (a) cost of, (b) length of and (c) waiting time for a hearing of an appeal to the Crown Court from the decision of magistrates on mode of trial, under the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill; [107034]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of defendants in each of the last three years who would have exercised the right of appeal to the Crown Court on mode of trial, under the provisions to be introduced by the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill; [107029]

(3) what estimate he has made of the average (a) cost of, (b) length of and (c) waiting time for a trial in the magistrates court following the dismissal of an appeal to the Crown Court from the decision of magistrates on mode of trial, under the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill. [107033]

Mr. Straw: The new appeal procedure would be fast and efficient with determination within forty-eight hours in most cases. Our estimate is that even if as many as a quarter of defendants who had been refused Crown Court trial were to appeal, the cost of the resulting hearings would be less than £500,000. No additional delay would be caused by these appeals, since they would run concurrently with the progress of the case in the magistrates court.

Police Complaints Authority

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were undertaking investigations under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority in each month for each of the last five years for which figures are available; and what was the annual cost of these investigations. [107032]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is not recorded centrally on the number of police officers undertaking Police Complaints Authority supervised investigations or on the cost of those investigations.

The number of cases accepted by the Police Complaints Authority for a supervised investigation in each of the last five years is as follows:

Year	Number
1995–96	1,142
1996–97	998
1997–98	979
1998–99	953
1999–2000	638 [1]

[1] Up to 31 December 1999

Alexander Schweidler

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government investigations into Alexander Schweidler. [106941]

Mr. Straw: Mr. Schweidler was granted British citizenship in 1964. I understand that he died on 24 January. His case was one of just under 400 cases involving allegations of offences under the War Crimes Act 1991 investigated by the Metropolitan Police Service

War Crimes Unit during the 1990s. Police investigations into allegations against Mr. Schweidler started in 1994. I understand there was insufficient evidence to support a prosecution. There have been no investigations separate to these.

Senator Pinochet

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to public funds of the proceedings concerning Senator Pinochet since his arrest. [105494]

Mr. Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost to date of the detention of Senator Pinochet broken down into (a) legal, (b) security and (c) other costs. [105247]

Mr. Straw: Total costs will be estimated once the case is completed. The costs we are able to calculate at this stage total £1,322,326.83. The breakdown of this is as follows:

(a) Legal Costs

Costs incurred to date by the Crown Prosecution Service

Counsel's fees: £353,000

Interpreter's fees: £4,200

Other cost (including Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) staff time, photocopying, etc): £238,000

Costs to Treasury Solicitors.

Amicus curiae (approximate costs and disbursements including counsel's fees: £70,000

Other costs and disbursements: £18,000

Costs incurred to date by the Home Office

£38,110.29p is, subject to agreement or assessment by the court recoverable under costs orders made against Senator Pinochet by the Divisional Court.

Treasury Solicitors fees: £36,000

Costs incurred to date by the Lord Chancellor's Office

Application to vacate at the House of Lords: £151,361.30

Hearing dealt with to date in the Divisional Court: £31,328.39

(b) Security Costs

Police costs incurred in detaining Senator Pinochet are a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the Chief Constable of Surrey.

(c) Other Costs

Cost of Medical Examination: £5,501.25.

The figures exclude VAT, (which is payable in some but not all items).

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105869]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 24 November 1999]: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury gave the right hon. Member on 24 January 2000, Official Report, columns 117–18W.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Medical Assessments

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many medically qualified panel members appointed under the Social Security Act 1998 are (a) employed and (b) contracted on a sessional basis, by the Sema Group to carry out medical assessments on behalf of the Benefits Agency; [103733]

(2) how many medically qualified panel members appointed under the Social Security Act 1998 were formerly (a) employed and (b) contracted on a sessional basis, by the (i) Benefits Agency and (ii) Sema Group to carry out medical assessments in connection with social security benefit claims. [103732]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

Salaried staff employed by Medical Services (SEMA) who are medically qualified are excluded by the Lord Chancellor's Department from appointment as medically qualified Appeals Panel Members.

On leaving full-time employment for Medical Services (SEMA), the doctors are excluded from undertaking Tribunal work for a period of two years. There is only a finite pool of doctors who possess the requisite skills in Disability Assessment Medicine and also meet the criteria for appointment as Medical Members of the Appeals Panel. The great majority of these doctors are engaged as part-time sessional fee paid doctors by Nestor Disability Analysis Ltd (NDA) which is an approved subcontractor to SEMA Group in the delivery of Medical Services on behalf of the Benefits Agency. Doctors who are engaged by Medical Services (SEMA) via NDA are allowed to be appointed as medical members of Appeals panels.

The Appeals Service has in place stringent procedures to ensure that medical members of Appeals Panels do not sit on Tribunals where the Appellant has had any previous professional relationships with a medical member or where a medical member has had any involvement whatsoever in giving advice to, or undertaking assessments for, the first tier decision making process which is under appeal.

Expenditure

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will estimate the expenditure in current prices in (1) 1978–79, (2) 1982–83, (3) 1986–87, (4) 1991–92, (5) 1996–97 and (6) 2001–02 on (a) supplementary benefit, (b) income support, (c) family income supplement, (d) family credit, (e) working families tax credit, (f) disability working allowance, (g) disabled persons tax credit, (h) rent rebates and allowances, (i) rates rebates, (j) community charge rebates, (k) council tax benefit, (l) social fund grants and (m) social fund loans, including any social security expenditure by local authorities; and if he will provide, where available, a breakdown in each case for (i) pensioners, (ii) disabled non-pensioners, (iii) unemployed non-pensioners and (iv) other non-pensioners; [105533]

(2) if he will estimate the expenditure in current prices in (1) 1978–79, (2) 1982–83, (3) 1986–87, (4) 1991–92, (5) 1996–97 and (6) 2001–02 on (a) the basic state retirement pension, including Christmas bonus, (b) additional retirement pensions, (c) invalidity benefit, (d) incapacity benefit, (e) industrial injuries and death benefits, (f) national insurance widow's benefits, including lump sums, (g) sickness benefit, (h) statutory sick pay, (i) statutory maternity pay, (j) national insurance maternity benefits, (k) unemployment benefit, (l) contribution-based jobseeker's allowance, (m) national insurance lump-sum maternity grants and (n) national insurance lump-sum death grants, including any social security expenditure by local authorities; and if he will provide, where available, a breakdown in each case for (i) pensioners, (ii) disabled non-pensioners, (iii) unemployed non-pensioners and (iv) other non-pensioners; [105532]

(3) if he will estimate the expenditure in current prices in (1) 1978–79, (2) 1982–83, (3) 1986–87, (4) 1991–92, (5) 1996–97 and (6) 2001–02 on (a) child benefit, (b) one parent benefit, (c) non-contributory retirement pensions, (d) war pensions, (e) attendance allowance, (f) disability living allowance, (g) mobility allowance, (h) invalid care allowance, (i) non-contributory invalidity pension, (j) severe disablement allowance, (k) maternity grants not funded from the National Insurance Fund, (l) winter fuel payments and (m) concessionary television licences, where funded by his Department, including any social security expenditure by local authorities; and if he will provide where available, a breakdown in each case for (i) pensioners, (ii) disabled non-pensioners, (iii) unemployed non-pensioners and (iv) other non-pensioners. [105534]

Mr. Rooker: Great Britain figures for 1978–79 to 1996–97 for each benefit are published in the Social Security Departmental Report 1999 (Cm 4214) and earlier equivalents. Projections for each DSS benefit and additional Local Authority expenditure for 2001–02 are in my reply to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on 26 November 1999, Official Report, columns 218–20W.

Projections for the cost of the Working Families Tax Credit and the Disabled Person's Tax Credit for the United Kingdom in 2001–02 are in Table B13 of the November 1999 pre Budget Report. A breakdown of individual benefits by client group, where available, is in the table.

Correspondence

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will instruct the Independent Tribunal Service in Broad Street, Birmingham, to reply to the letter dated 13 October 1999 from the hon. and learned Member for Harborough on behalf of Mrs. Jo Plant of Oadby, Leicestershire. [106952]

Angela Eagle: Administration of the Appeals Service (formally the Independent Tribunal Service) is the responsibility of the Chief Executive, Neil Ward. I understand Neil Ward wrote to the hon. Member on 25 January 2000.

Examining Medical Practitioners

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state the number of examining medical practitioners contracted to (a) the Benefits Agency Medical Service and (b) SEMA; how many of them had qualified four years or fewer previously; and how many were aged over 65 years. [106686]

Mr. Bayley: The Benefits Agency Medical Services (BAMS) provided medical advice and examinations for this Department and other Government Departments in support of the delivery of Incapacity and Disability Benefits.

The service was provided by, approximately, 3,000 part-time contracted doctors.

The work previously undertaken by BAMS has been contracted out, from 1 September 1998, to Sema Group. The services previously provided by BAMS are now undertaken by Sema Group 'Medical Services', and are provided on behalf of the Benefits Agency (BA).

Medical Services have a total of 2,968 doctors contracted to undertake medical examinations, of these a total of 570 are over the age of 65.

Records held do not show any doctors with less than four years experience.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105872]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the written answer from my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 24 January 2000, Official Report, columns 117–18W.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what powers are available to the Child Support Agency to investigate and take action against elected members or former elected members of local authorities who withhold details of attendance allowances and other allowances in their disclosure of financial details on which the level of child support is determined; and if he will make a statement. [106470]

Angela Eagle: It is not right that some parents can seek to avoid their maintenance obligation by failing to provide information to the Child Support Agency (CSA) or by providing the wrong information.

Two new criminal offences are being introduced in the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill which is currently before Parliament. The offences apply to anyone who fails to provide information or gives false information to the CSA, there is a fine of up to £1,000 on conviction.

Local authority councillors are treated as being employed by Local authorities. Flat-rate allowances and attendance allowances paid to local authority councillors are therefore treated as earnings for child support purposes.

Where the CSA receives an allegation that a non-resident parent is not declaring his full earnings they will contact his employer direct for the information. If details of the earnings are still not forthcoming, an inspector may be sent out to obtain them. If it were established that a councillor had deliberately withheld information about attendance or other allowances, a prosecution under the proposed new powers would certainly be considered. The Agency already has powers to pursue and enforce any arrears of maintenance which may become due.

Winter Fuel Allowance

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when male pensioners over the age of 60 years will be paid winter fuel allowance. [106921]

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) for what reason no winter fuel payments have to made to male claimants aged between 60 and 65 years following the decision of the European Court; [106795]

(2) when he plans to start making winter fuel payments to male claimants between 60 and 65 years of age, pursuant to the decision of the European Court. [106794]

Angela Eagle: I refer my hon. Friend and the right hon. and learned Member to the written answer I gave the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 81W.

Carers

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reason he chose not to introduce home responsibilities protection into SERPs for carers and disabled people from April 1999. [106845]

Mr. Rooker: The pension needs of carers and disabled people are being met through the State Second Pension, for which legislation is currently being considered by Parliament.

State Pension

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received about the planned April 2000 uprating of the state pension; how many of these are (a) in favour and (b) not in favour of the uprating; and if he will make a statement. [106739]

Mr. Rooker: Around 5,000 letters were received up to 19 January regarding the April 2000 uprating of the State Pension. Only the subject of each inquiry is recorded, so the specific information requested is not available. Two early-day motions have been tabled, and several petitions, including newspaper campaigns, received. These claimed that the increase was inadequate.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many more people would receive a state second pension if the child care qualification was amended to include individuals paid child benefit for children under (a) eight, (b) 10, (c) 12, (d) 14 years and (e) 16 years assuming retirement in (i) 2005, (ii) 2010, (iii) 2015, (iv) 2025 and (v) 2047; [106848]

(2) how many more people would be recipients of the state second pension if he aligned the rules for home responsibilities protection for the state second pension with those that currently apply to the basic state pension taking (a) 2005, (b) 2010, (c) 2015, (d) 2025 and (e) 2047 as the year at retirement. [106849]

Mr. Rooker: The number of additional people who would be brought into State Second Pension by the suggested changes is likely to be negligible.

Benefits (Young People)

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the annual cost of restoring benefits to 16 and 17-year-olds in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland. [106668]

Angela Eagle: We believe that every young person should have the opportunity to achieve their potential. That is why our aim is to engage 16 and 17-year-olds in education, training or work with training, rather than starting their adult lives dependent on the benefits system.

Departments are working together to develop and implement the proposals in the Government White Paper, "Learning to Succeed", and the Social Exclusion Unit's report, "Bridging the Gap", which are aimed at supporting young people in making a successful transition from childhood to adult life.

The estimated cost of restoring full entitlement to Social Security benefits to 16 to 17-year-olds in Great Britain would be £100 million per annum, at present rates for the under 18s. The equivalent cost for Scotland would be in the order of £10 million per annum. These costs do not make any allowance for possible changes in labour market behaviour as a result of these changes.

The figures refer to Great Britain and Scotland. For information about Northern Ireland I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the impact on the level of benefit payments of setting the minimum wage for young people at £3.60 per hour. [106670]

Mr. Bayley: It is estimated that expenditure on departmental benefits will decrease by £15 million if the minimum wage for young people is increased from £3.00 per hour currently to £3.60 per hour. This assumes there are no secondary effects on employment or wages.

Notes:

1. Estimates based on 1996–97 Family Resources Survey data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates.
2. Estimates rounded to the nearest £5 million. This covers Income Support, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit only.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the impact on the level of benefit payments of maintaining the minimum wage at its present level. [106669]

Mr. Bayley: It is estimated that the cost to the Social Security budget of maintaining the minimum wage at its present level is £10 million at 2000–01 prices.

Notes:

1. Estimates based on 1996–97 Family Resources Survey data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates.
2. Estimates rounded to the nearest £5 million.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the impact on each benefit payable to those in paid employment of a national minimum wage of (a) £3.80 and (b) £4.00 for the next financial year. [107144]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

Estimated savings in 2000–01 on benefits payable to those in paid employment of a national minimum wage of (A) £3.80 and (B) £4.00

£ million

	£3.80	£4.00
Income Support/JSA(IB)	−15	−30
Housing Benefit	−25	−50
Council Tax Benefit	−5	−10
Total	−50	−90

1. Estimates based on 1996–97 Family Resources Survey data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates.
2. Estimates rounded to the nearest £5 million. Totals may not add up owing to rounding.
3. Estimates assume no secondary effects on employment or wages.

Pensioner Statistics

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of (a) retired people, (b) pensioners, and (c) people over the age of 65 in each (i) English county and (ii) parliamentary constituency; and what is the average figure in each category. [106738]

Mr. Rooker: This information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of pensioners over the age of (a) 75 and (b) 80 in (i) Yeovil constituency and (ii) South Somerset; and if he will make a statement. [106737]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

1991 census information of the population by age group in Yeovil constituency

	Aged 75 and over	Aged 85 and over
Yeovil	7,800	1,600

Mid-98 estimates of the population by age group in South Somerset

	Aged over 75	Aged over 80
South Somerset	13,100	7,100

Notes:
1. For part (i), mid-year population estimates are not compiled by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) for parliamentary constituencies. The lowest level at which population estimates are available is the local authority level. 1991 Census information has therefore been used. Figures by the precise age groups requested are not available.
2. For part (ii), mid-98 population estimates for South Somerset have been provided. These are the latest available population estimates.
3. The people in these age groups are not necessarily pensioners.
4. Figures are rounded to the nearest hundred persons throughout.

State Second Pension

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people, by gender, would benefit, and at what cost, from crediting carers for the state second pension on a weekly basis. [106850]

Mr. Rooker: It is not possible to provide the costs requested without further detailed assumptions on how such a system would work. Furthermore, it is unlikely to be operationally feasible to provide entitlement based on weeks rather than whole tax years.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many more people would receive the state second pension, at what cost, and how much would be payable in pension, if he aligned 35 hours of care qualification for credits to the state second pension with the minimum wage qualification of 18 hours, taking (a) 2005, (b) 2010, (c) 2015, (d) 2025 and (e) 2047 as the retirement years; [106847]

(2) how many (a) men and (b) women in each of the last five years have notified the Contributions Agency of the home responsibilities protection entitlement (i) at state pension age, (ii) two years before state pension age, (iii) five years before state pension age, (iv) 10 years before state pension age and (v) 15 years before state pension age. [106846]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 20 December 1999, Official Report, column 327W, concerning invalid care allowance, if he will estimate the cost of crediting for each year those invalid care allowance recipients whose award (a) has been terminated (b) is current, where awards were made from (i) 1981, (ii) 1991, (iii) 1995 and (iv) 1999, their state second pension, assuming a retirement in (1) 2002, (2) 2005, (3) 2010, (4) 2015, and (5) 2025. [106853]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available.

Press Releases

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many press releases his Department issued in each year from 1995 to 1999. [106560]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Number of press releases issued by the Department and it agencies from 1995–1999

1997	291	60	50	10
1998	311	42	28	4
1999	324	48	—	3

Notes:
1. Press releases for the War Pensions Agency and Information Technology Agency are included in the figures given for Headquarters.
2. The 1999 column for Contributions Agency does not show a figure as the Agency has transferred to the Inland Revenue.

Independent Living Funds

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make changes to the payments limits and earnings disregard operated by the Independent Living Funds. [107383]

Mr. Bayley: I am pleased to be able to announce changes to both the ILF payment limits and the earnings disregard. The limit for payments from the Extension Fund will be increased from £560 a week to £625 a week, and the £300 a week limit for 1993 Fund cases will be raised to £375 per week. Within the 1993 Fund the overall joint limit, in conjunction with local authorities, on care packages that can be funded will be raised from £500 a week to £625 a week.

A more generous disregard of earnings will also be introduced, to allow those severely disabled people who are able to work to gain greater reward from that work. At present only the first £30 a week of reckonable earnings is disregarded. In future, in addition to this £30 a week of reckonable earnings is disregarded. In future, in addition to this £30, the Funds will also disregard 45 per cent. of the remaining earnings up to a maximum of £200 reckonable earnings per week. The new disregard will apply to household earnings, not just the earnings of the disabled person. The changes will come into effect immediately.

Chief Adjudication Officer's Report

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the final report of the Chief Adjudication Officer; and if he will make a statement. [107723]

Angela Eagle: The report is published today and copies have been placed in the Library. The Chief Adjudication Officer's findings record that, in a difficult transitional period for the Agencies as they adopted the new decision making and appeals processes, standards have in general been maintained. He is, in particular, encouraged by the fact that the Agencies continued to look for ways to effect improvements across benefits. As this is his final report and with his staff moving on to new areas of work, the Chief Adjudication Officer has taken the opportunity to praise them for their work.

The Chief Adjudication Officer welcomes the changes to decision-making and appeals that were introduced last year. As he acknowledges, those changes lie at the very heart of Ministers' plans for modernising Social Security delivery and promise substantially improved standards of service for customers.

Chief Executives have taken on the Chief Adjudication Officer's responsibilities for guidance to decision makers and monitoring and reporting on standards. They are now accountable for the quality of decision making in their agencies. The changes help to get decisions right. If a mistake is made, it can be put right more easily. Notifications will be clearer and easier to understand.

Improvements have been made to the handling of appeals. The ending of the rigid requirement for three person tribunals means that expert resources can be better focused on the issues raised in each appeal. Appeal waiting times will be cut. A new agency is being set up to handle the administration of appeals and we will set demanding targets for clearing appeals.

These changes will deliver real improvements in service to clients. And we have preserved the essential elements of the current system: decisions continue to be made impartially by applying the law to the facts of each case, and clients still have the right of appeal to an independent tribunal.

TREASURY

Public Expenditure

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the existing planned total for public expenditure for 2001–02 will be adhered to when the next Comprehensive Spending Review is announced; and if he will make a statement. [106461]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 11 November 1999, Official Report, column 781W.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals are being considered by his Department, the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub post offices. [105862]

Mr. Timms: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to him by the Minister for Competitiveness on 20 January 2000, Official Report, columns 519–20W.

Economic Stability

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he plans to take to protect the UK economy in the event of a considerable stock exchange fall in the United States and the impact that would have on the world economy; and if he will make a statement. [106525]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government have taken firm action to lock in economic stability and open the way to steady growth. Sound public finances and low and stable inflation have greatly enhanced the ability of the UK economy to withstand adverse external shocks. In particular, the Government's symmetrical inflation target ensures that policy can respond quickly to risks on the downside, such as from an unforseen fall in equity prices, as well as to risks on the upside. The Government have also played a leading role in promoting macroeconomic stability across the world, to help reduce the likelihood of future global shocks.

Brussels Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the outcome was of the Budget Council held in Brussels on 18 January; and if he will make a statement. [106563]

Miss Melanie Johnson: There was no Budget Council on 18 January.

Mortgages

Barbara Follett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has decided to set CAT standards for mortgages. [107384]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Yes. The Treasury will set CAT standards for two types of mortgage: one charging variable interest rates, and one charging fixed or capped rates. Like the CAT standards for individual savings accounts, CAT standards for mortgages will define products with reasonable charges, easy access and decent terms and which can readily be understood.

The standards will be voluntary and non-CAT standard mortgages may be appropriate for many borrowers. But because they will be simple, clear and fair, CAT standard mortgages will help customers to make better informed and more confident choices about mortgage loans. Subject to consultation, FSA's disclosure regime will help prospective borrowers understand how particular mortgage offers measure up to the CAT standards.

The basic features of CAT standard mortgages are set out.

Variable rate	Fixed or capped rate
Charges—No separate charge for mortgage indemnity guarantee insurance. Any other fees disclosed up front, including any fees and charges which may be payable later in the mortgage. Interest calculated and capitalised daily.
No fee payable by the borrower for arranging the mortgage. Interest rate no higher than two percentage points above base rate. Interest rates to adjust to keep within the prescribed margin against base rate within four weeks for downward movements. No redemption or early settlement charge at any time.	Any booking fee not to exceed £150. Any redemption charge should be a maximum of 1 per cent. of the loan for each remaining year of the fixed period, reducing monthly, and expressed in cash terms. No redemption charge after the fixed or capped rate period. No redemption charge if the borrower continues the mortgage with a new purchasing a new property with or without a top-up loan.

Access—No restriction to existing customers. Mortgages available on the normal terms on which the lender grants loans, including loans for the lender's normal range of residential properties, and the lender's standard criteria for creditworthiness. Borrowers must be able to continue a CAT standard mortgage when moving house provided the existing lender is willing to lend on the new property. Regular payments available on any day of the month of the borrower's choosing. Early repayments permitted at any time.
Terms—All mortgage documents, including advertising and marketing literature, and explanations of charges, to be put in language which is fair, clear and not misleading. No tying in, i.e. no obligation for borrowers to buy any other product with the mortgage. Any linked special offers to be priced item by item, with discounts expressed explicitly where they apply. If the lender can no longer continue with CAT standard terms in an existing mortgage, borrower's must have at least six months' notice of the change. Borrowers in arrears equivalent to up to three months' repayments pay standard interest charges only on the outstanding debt (including accrued interest). After that period the lender may decide that CAT standard terms no longer apply.

A more full description of the CAT standards, subject to further consultation with the industry to firm up the technical specification, is being made available in the Library.

Barbara Follett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has decided whether the Financial Services Authority should regulate mortgage lending. [107385]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government are determined that lenders should not take advantage of mortgage borrowers at a time when they are often vulnerable because their main priority is home purchase. In a modern competitive economy they should expect to be able to finance residential property purchases with confidence that they will understand the nature of the product they are buying and the risks.

The Treasury carried out a consultation exercise in the second half of last year to examine the case for giving the Financial Services Authority (FSA) responsibility for regulating mortgage business. This was the recommendation of the Joint Committee on the Financial Services and Markets Bill (HC328/HL50) and of the Treasury Committee (HC 73). I am grateful to those in the mortgage industry, as well as borrowers and consumer representatives, for engaging in purposeful dialogue and contributing constructive feedback. The exercise showed that prospective borrowers' main need is better information about the many loans on offer in this competitive and sometimes confusing market.

I have therefore decided that a statutory instrument under the Financial Services and Markets Bill, now before this House, will give the FSA statutory responsibility for regulating nearly all residential mortgages. This will mean that all mortgage lenders will have to be authorised by FSA with specific permission to lend on mortgage. It will not be necessary for mortgage brokers to be authorised unless they also carry out investment business such as advising on endowment policies, where authorisation is already required.

This will make the mortgage market more transparent for borrowers. The new power will enable the FSA to regulate mortgage advertising and to require all mortgage lending activity to include specific disclosure of the main features of the loan. The FSA will consult on its policy approach and rules, including their regulatory impact, later this year, with a view to bringing the new regulatory regime for mortgages into effect next year. These rules will be designed to complement the voluntary Code operated by the Council of Mortgage Lenders. This has helped deliver welcome improvements, for instance in the competence and expertise of mortgage advisers.

The introduction of mortgage regulation and CAT standards, which I am announcing separately today, will take place in parallel with several other measures designed to help home buyers. Recent announcements include the proposed revision to the regulations on annual percentage rates (APRs), which my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry laid before the House on 26 November, the package of measures announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing on 11 October about improving the house-buying process, and the proposal, announced by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 17 December, to prevent lenders making a compulsory link between mortgages and home insurance deals.

The approach to regulation of the mortgage market reflects the nature of mortgage loans. If information is clear mortgages are intrinsically easier to understand than, for instance, many retail investments, such as endowments. With the new safeguards, we expect there to be many fewer consumers who regret their choice and it will be much easier for mortgage borrowers who do then come to regret their choice to disengage and remortgage at reasonable cost. The FSA already regulates advice on investment products designed to repay mortgages, such as endowment policies.

These complementary measures will improve the quality and coverage of the information available to prospective mortgage borrowers and house buyers. They will deliver the essential protections borrowers need without burdening them with requirements which could unnecessarily slow down the sales process.

I am today making available in the Library a summary of the evidence about detriment in the mortgage market collected in the course of the recent consultation exercise.

School and Hospital Budgets

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to provide for longer-term funding settlements for key public services by fixing budgets for schools and hospitals for three year periods; and if he will make a statement. [106466]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 24 January 2000]: There are no such plans at present.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 January 2000, Official

Report, column 513W, concerning households receiving working families tax credit, how much of the information requested is available; and if he will publish it. [106735]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates of the number of households in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit are not yet available, but will be available shortly.

Fees

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the fees his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies collect; how much has been raised or it is anticipated will be raised from each of these fees from 1989–90 to 2004–05; and which of these fees count as negative expenditure. [106001]

Mr. Timms: The following fees and charges are collected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Departments and can be used to offset the relevant expenditure.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many questions to his Department tabled for ordinary written answer during Session 1998–99 were answered (a) within two weeks of tabling, (b) within one month of tabling, (c) within three months of tabling and (d) after three months of tabling. [106489]

Mr. Timms: The information is as follows (a) 1,170; (b) 1,245; (c) 1,286 and (d) none.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many questions to his Department tabled for written answer on a named day during Session 1998–99 were answered (a) on or before a named day, (b) within one week of a named day, (c) within one month of a named day, (d) within three months of a named day and (e) after three months of a named day. [106482]

Mr. Timms: The information is as follows (a) 288; (b) 665; (c) 780; (d) 813; and (e) none.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many questions to his Department were tabled for written answer during session 1998–99; and how many of these he replied to (a) by means of a letter placed in the Library rather than by substantive answer in the Official Report, (b) by stating that a substantive answer could not be given due to information not being held centrally and (c) by stating that a substantive answer could not be given due to disproportionate cost. [106485]

Mr. Timms: 2,099 written questions were tabled to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1998–99.

The other information sought by the hon. Member is not held in an accessible form. However, Treasury Ministers seldom reply to Parliamentary questions by letter rather than by substantive answer printed in the Official Report, and would normally do so only in the case of questions tabled shortly before the Summer Recess or Prorogation which could not be answered before the House rose.

Public Debt

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to amend his net public debt target to a target of public sector net wealth following the introduction of resource accounting. [106775]

Mr. Andrew Smith: No.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Walker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much funding from the Capital Modernisation Fund will be allocated to Northern Ireland in the next financial year; and how the amount will be determined. [106806]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Northern Ireland's share of funding from the Capital Modernisation Fund is determined by applying the Barnett formula to successful bids to the Fund for projects in England. In the 1999 Budget Northern Ireland was assigned a minimum allocation from the Capital Modernisation Fund of £50 million from 1999–2000 to 2001–02, which represents an indicative allocation of £19.5 million in 2000–01. The funding will be reviewed when final allocations are made from the fund.

Public Investment

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the base year is from which he intends to double net public investment by 2002; and which year is the final year. [106777]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Comparisons over the Comprehensive Spending Review period take a baseline of 1998–99 and a final year of 2001–02.

Departmental Budgets

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if departments will be allowed to exceed their expenditure limits in 2000–01 and 2001–02 if they receive budgetary transfers from other departments that have spent below their departmental expenditure limits. [106776]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Details of planned transfers in 2000–01 and 2001–02 between departmental expenditure limits, reflecting transfers of financing responsibility between Departments or spending sectors or machinery of government changes, are set out in Chapter 2 of "Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses 1999–2000," published in March 1999 (Cm 4201).

Farming

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many farming businesses paid corporation tax (a) in the last year for which information is available and (b) five years ago. [106536]

Dawn Primarolo: Only a small minority of farmers run their businesses as incorporated concerns subject to corporation tax with the majority being self employed and paying income tax. An estimated 10,500 farming incorporated businesses had a corporation tax liability for accounting periods ending in 1997–98 compared with 12,200 such businesses in 1992–93.

Electronic Business

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the Treasury's business is undertaken electronically at present; and what target has been set. [106801]

Dawn Primarolo: The Treasury has already met its target, due to be achieved in 2002, to increase the proportion of business undertaken electronically, in accordance with Government targets, to more than 25 per cent. of external communications.

Specific targets have been set for non-ministerial correspondence, where the Treasury now has 100 per cent. capability, and for electronic procurement of goods and services, where the current achievement of 55 per cent. exceeds the 40 per cent. target.

The Treasury carries out a very high proportion of its internal business electronically. The principal constraint to carrying out more external business electronically is the capability of external contacts.

Small Companies (Employee Incomes)

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employees working in companies employing fewer than five people have earnings between (a) the lower earnings limit and £5,000, (b) £5,001 and £7,000, (c) £7,001 and £8,000, (d) £8,001 and £9,000, (e) £9,001 and £9,500, (f) £9,501 and £10,000, (g) £10,001 and £12,000, (h) £12,001 and £14,000, (i) £14,001 and £16,000, (j) £16,001 and £18,000 and (k) £18,001 to £18,500 for each of the past five years. [106709]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Frank Field, dated 27 January 2000:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question regarding the number of people working in companies which employ fewer than 5 people, and receive earnings in various earnings bands above the lower earnings limit.

The New Earnings Survey (NES), carried out in April of each year, is a one per cent. sample of all employees who are members of pay-as-you-earn (PAYE) schemes. However, I am only able to provide estimates of the percentage of employees whose earnings lie within specified ranges, rather than numbers, because appropriate factors to gross the survey results to accommodate this sample frame are not currently available. Additionally, I am unable to provide data for years prior to 1998 since estimates of annual earnings and enterprise size are not available.

The available information, from the 1998 and 1999 New Earnings Surveys, is attached.

I will arrange for a copy of this letter to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

[1] Annual earnings have been calculated only for those employees that have been in the same job for at least 12 months. Employees with less than 12 months attachment may have relevant annual earnings from another employer but these would not be identified in the NES. Consequently, taking annual earnings for all employees would give a misleading (under) estimate.

[2] The lower earnings limit was £3,328 in April and £3,432 in April 1999.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent meeting with the Portuguese Finance Minister. [107035]

Dawn Primarolo: The Chancellor met the Portuguese Finance Minister, Pina Moura, on 13 January 2000. Their discussion focused on the Portuguese Presidency programme, including the Lisbon Special European Council on employment, economic reform and social cohesion.

Landfill Tax

Ms Squire: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money has been raised from Landfill Tax, broken down by local authority areas in Scotland in each of the last three years. [106369]

Mr. Timms: As Landfill Tax declared by operators is not allocated to specific sites we cannot provide receipts broken down by local authority areas.

Receipts from operators based in Scotland are estimated at £26 million in 1998–99, £33 million in 1997–98 and £11 million in the part year 1996–97, following the introduction of Landfill Tax on 1 October 1996; all figures are net of contributions to the environmental credit scheme.

EU Structural Funds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what derogations he has (a) sought and (b) secured from the European Commission with regard to the application of the principle of additionality, to allow Her Majesty's Treasury to receive structural funds from the EU, designated for specific regions, without having to pass on those funds to the relevant regions. [107016]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government have neither sought nor secured derogations from the European Commission in respect of the application of the principle of additionality.

Asset Sales

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what directions for Government Departments and local authorities to sell surplus state assets he issued (a) prior to 18 October 1999 and (b) subsequently; and if he will make a statement. [107153]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government have put in place a number of incentives to ensure public sector assets are managed efficiently. The National Asset Register was published in November 1997, setting out for the first time the assets held by central Government. New incentives to dispose of surplus assets were introduced from 1 April 1998, which allow Departments to recycle receipts from disposals to be reinvested in public sector assets.

As part of the Comprehensive Spending Review Departments prepared investment strategies, which were published in March 1999, setting out plans for new investment, improved asset utilisation and procedures and systems to ensure value for money. As part of the move to resource accounting and budgeting, Departments are currently producing balance sheets which will show the full value of their asset holdings and budgets that include the cost of capital consumption in the form of a capital charge. Local authorities are currently producing investment overviews across their estate which build upon their ongoing work drawing-up asset management plans.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to ensure that the sale of surplus assets will not result in the loss of playing fields. [107173]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government have put in place a number of measures to protect playing fields. The Department for Education and Employment have introduced new legislation to require all state schools to seek consent for the disposal of playing fields, which includes consultation with community and user groups. The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions have published a Direction enabling Ministers to consider planning applications concerning local authority playing fields and those used by educational establishment where Sport England have objected to the proposals.

Sport England also remains statutory consultee on all playing field planning applications and ask local authority planning policies to permit development on playing fields only where it can be demonstrated that there is a proven excess of provision. Finally, Lottery funding of £125 million will be devoted to a new green space initiative, including the creation of new playing fields.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Local Government Finance (London)

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for the budgets of the Greater London Authority, Transport for London, the London Development Agency, the Metropolitan Police Authority and the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority for 2000–01 and for the Greater London Authority's precepts for that year. [107724]

Mr. Hill: I have today issued a consultation paper setting out my proposals to the London boroughs, the ALG, representatives of industry and commerce, predecessor bodies and other interested parties. Subject to consultation, it is proposed to set a consolidated budget requirement for the GLA and functional bodies for 2000–01 of £2,179 million. We estimate that this will support total spending of some £3,600 million. Of this only £333 million will need to be raised from council taxpayers. For a Band D council taxpayer, this is equivalent to about £123 a year in the London Boroughs and £32 a year in the City.

Just £1.70 of this is to fund the additional cost of the new GLA services: about 3 pence a week for a Band D council taxpayer as promised in the White Paper "A Mayor and Assembly for London" (March 1998, Cm 3897). Nearly three-quarters of the council tax goes to fund the Metropolitan police. Since the Metropolitan police district does not include the City, this accounts for the lower cost borne by City council taxpayers.

From 2001–02 onwards the consolidated budget for the GLA and functional bodies will be set by the Mayor.

Rent Levels

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the impact on rent levels of the Court of Appeal's decision in the case of Spath Holme Ltd. vs. Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions; and if he will make a statement on the impact of the judgment on his Department's policies. [107183]

Mr. Raynsford: The Court of Appeal's decision to quash the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999 is likely to lead to significant increases in fair rents which would have been capped under the Order.

We are giving careful consideration to the implications of the judgment. We remain committed to protecting tenants from excessive increases in fair rents.

Regeneration (Birmingham)

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make an announcement on the Arena Central Regeneration Project in Birmingham. [106978]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government have set a target for deciding called-in planning applications within 13 weeks of receipt of the Inspector's Report following the local inquiry. In this case the primary target for decision was 4 January 2000. Although the Secretary of State has not been able to complete his consideration of all the issues raised by this proposal within the primary target, the Government do fully recognise the importance of speedy decisions for the local economy. I therefore expect to be able to issue a decision within the secondary target of 22 February.

Sutton Railway Station

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ask the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority to investigate the cause of the delayed implementation of the refurbishment of Sutton Station by Connex and take steps with both Railtrack and the train operating company to expedite the project. [106852]

Mr. Hill: This is a matter which is primarily for the train operator and Railtrack to resolve. However, I have asked the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority to monitor the situation.

Green Belt

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total area of land within the established green belt in England on 1 January (a) 1976, (b) 1979, (c) 1982, (d) 1985, (e) 1988, (f) 1991, (g) 1994, (h) 1997 and (i) 2000. [106874]

Mr. Raynsford: Figures published in December 1999 show that green belt in England in 1997 amounted to 1,652,300 hectares of land. This estimate is based on a new analysis of information in local plans and is more reliable than previously published figures for earlier years, which have been shown to be inaccurate.

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total area of established green belt land given non-conforming use planning permissions in each of the past 20 years. [106875]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally by the Department, and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Architects Registration Board

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the work and progress of the Architects Registration Board. [106876]

Mr. Raynsford: The Architects Registration Board came into being in April 1997 and has made good progress since its inception.

I look forward to the election of new registered architect members and the appointment by the Board of a new Registrar/Chief Executive.

Rail Safety

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the report on signals passed at danger in December 1999 will be published. [107469]

Mr. Hill: I have today placed in the Library a copy of HSE's report on signals passed at danger (SPADs) for December. Future monthly reports will be placed in the Library as a matter of course.

In December there were 22 SPADs on the national railway. This figure is lower than for the same month in the last two years and half the December average for the last six years. Taken with the significant improvement in November, the December figure appears to indicate that the measures being taken by the industry to cut down on SPADs are beginning to have a positive effect, although it is of course too early to draw definitive conclusions.

As explained in the October report, Railtrack and the HSE use different criteria to assess the severity and significance of a SPAD. This has led to some confusion as to how to identify for non-specialist purposes a consistent and simple definition by which a SPAD could be considered serious, to the extent that it gives rise to a potential for damage to passengers, staff, or equipment.

Ministers have accepted a recommendation by Her Majesty's Railways Inspectorate to define as "serious" those SPADs which fall into Railtrack's severity categories 3–8. These categories cover those SPADs which lead to a train over-running by at least 200 yards (the normal safety overlap distance) and/or which cause damage or casualties. This definition gives three serious SPADs in December. On this definition there were 14 serious SPADs in October and 10 in November.

Millennium Towns

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to announce the development of millennium towns; and if he will make a statement; [106877]

(2) if he plans to announce the creation of a millennium town in Kent; [106879]

(3) what criteria he will use in deciding to allow the building of millennium towns; [106880]

(4) how many millennium towns he intends to create. [106878]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Proposals for a new town and areas of plan-led expansion have been put forward respectively by the Panels examining draft Regional Planning Guidance for the Eastern and South East regions. The Secretary of State will shortly consult on draft changes to the draft Regional Planning Guidance for both regions.

Conveyancing

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the terms of reference of the pilot scheme in Bristol for testing the Government's proposals for speeding up the system of buying and selling homes in England and Wales; and what will be the cost to public funds of the pilot scheme. [107261]

Mr. Mullin: The Government announced on 11 October 1999 a package of complementary measures aimed at making the home buying and selling process in England and Wales faster, more transparent and consumer-friendly. The announcement also highlighted the Government's intention to set up a study to pilot some aspects of the seller's information pack with approximately 250 home sellers in the Bristol area, covering properties in different price bands and in popular and less-popular local housing markets.

The pilot was launched on 10 December 1999, and will run for the first half of 2000, reporting in September 2000. The results will help provide a clear picture of the practical operation of a modernised system of home buying and selling. However, the pilot cannot entirely replicate the Government's proposals: there is no element of compulsion; transactions may still experience delays especially where there are chains involving people not in the scheme; and voluntary elements of the Government's proposals are not included, for example faster mortgage processing, and faster release of title deeds.

Terms of Reference

1. To identify which elements of the pack work best, and where the practical difficulties lie, including consumer and professional attitudes to the home condition report, and the legal material required for the pack.

2. To provide clear information on the difference that a seller's pack makes to the process of buying and selling, including, where possible, whether packs help to avoid problems and delays, which occur under the present system.

3. To assess the potential housing market effects of seller's packs and the benefits of packs for properties in different price bands.

4. To compare the results of the Bristol pilot with existing initiatives which are being taken forward on a voluntary basis.

Cost to Public Funds

Total cost: £315,015.

Pollution Control

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the cost to the pig and poultry sectors of the charges levied by the Environment Agency in the implementation of the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control EU Directive 96/61. [107233]

Mr. Hill: No decisions have yet been taken on the level of charges to be applied to the pig and poultry sectors under regulations implementing integrated pollution prevention and control. The Environment Agency is still engaged in discussions with the National Farmers' Union, pig and poultry trade bodies and officials from my Department.

New Year's Eve

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total cost of cleaning up (a) central London and (b) its parks following the New Year's Eve celebrations. [104918]

Mr. Hill: The riparian boroughs, who have made a major contribution to the success of the Millennium celebrations in Central London, initially estimate that the cost of cleaning up the area covered by the event will be in the region of £500,000.

The Millennium Commission made grants available, under the Millennium Festival programme, to 22 UK cities, as a contribution towards the cost of clearing up after New Year's Eve. London is receiving £180,000 under these arrangements.

The Royal Parks Agency estimates that the total cost of the clear up operations in St. James's park, Green park and Victoria Tower Gardens will be between £55,000-£60,000.

Freight Forwarding Companies

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with representatives of the haulage industry about the freight forwarding companies; and if he will make a statement. [105240]

Mr. Hill: Ministers and officials in my Department have frequent contact with the representatives of the haulage industry. If my hon. Friend has any particular concerns about the freight forwarding companies, perhaps he could write to me.

VED Discounts

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the details of the scheme for vehicle excise duty discounts for vehicles with low carbon dioxide emissions, announced in November 1999. [105865]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his 1998 Budget Statement his plans for the introduction of a graduated system of Vehicle Excise Duty for new cars. Under this system, cars first registered after Autumn this year will be placed in one of four bands according to their carbon dioxide emissions. The system, which is being introduced on a revenue-neutral basis, will be introduced in a flexible way with the potential, for example, to create further incentives for cars which run on less polluting fuels.

Further details of the scheme will be announced in the forthcoming Budget, in advance of the system's introduction.

Nabishi Radios

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions the use of Nabishi hand-held radios has been reported as presenting problems for freight marshalling yards in the railway industry; and how many radio frequencies are available to train companies. [106289]

Mr. Hill: Information about the use of Nabishi hand-held radios having caused problems for freight marshalling yards in the railway industry is not available. Problems involving hand-held radios are not statutorily reportable to the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate, unless they relate to a reportable accident or dangerous occurrence as defined by the 'Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995' (RIDDOR).

The number of radio frequencies available to train operators is the responsibility of the Radiocommunications Agency, who authorise the use of radio by licensing.

Local Government (Camden)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has had about Camden Council's decision to reject an executive structure. [106321]

Ms Armstrong: Ministers have spoken on a number of occasions to interested parties about Camden's plans for modernisation.

Car Statistics

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many cars per mile there were on Britain's roads in (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999. [106688]

Mr. Hill: The calculations are shown in the table. Data for road length in 1999 are not available.

	1996	1997	1998	1999
Total road length (miles)	229,185	229,835	230,914	—
Number of cars	21,639,462	22,298,304	22,984,336	23,458,476
Cars per mile	94.4	97.0	99.5	—

Road lengths are as of 1 April each year. For the number of cars, figures are from 31 March for 1997, 1998 and 1999 but the 1996 figure is an estimate based upon figures from the end of 1995 and the end of June 1996. The road lengths do not necessarily reflect the amount of carriageway available to cars. For example, a mile of motorway is treated the same as a mile of minor road.

DVLA

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 210W, concerning the DVLA, what percentage of (a) car and motorcycle and (b) lorry and bus licence applications in which the applicant declared a medical condition were processed within the published standards in each month of 1999; and how many were outstanding with the DVLA for longer than the published standards in each month. [106716]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The published standards contain a time allowance for the receipt of advice from third parties necessary to complete the Agency's consideration. Taking that into account, the percentage number is as follows.

Percentage

Months	Car/motorcycle	Lorry/bus
January 1999	55	72
February	57	76
March	54	75
April	50	72
May	54	64
June	46	61
July	43	59
August	37	63
September	40	64
October	40	74
November	39	71
December	41	64

The number of new cases opened each month which either exceeded at closure or are still currently exceeding the published service standards was:

Months	Car/motorcycle	Lorry/bus
January 1999	10,150	1,497
February	11,551	1,281
March	11,514	1,304
April	11,705	1,003
May	9,118	999
June	12,923	1,369
July	11,687	1,105
August	10,164	972
September	14,405	1,137
October	12,734	790
November	14,485	978
December	9,185	786

As at 31 December the number of current cases outstanding which has exceeded the published service standards totalled 35,490 (car/motorcycle) and 1,981 (lorry/bus).

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 210W, concerning the DVLA, how many people were advised by the DVLA that the Medical Unit would take longer than the published standards of five to seven weeks to complete its investigations in each year since 1995. [106734]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 24 January 2000]: Figures were not produced for 1995–96 financial year and earlier. The figures for subsequent completed years are as follows:

Year	Letters sent
1996–97	41,987
1997–98	52,285
1998–99	84,600
1999–2000[1]	69,338

[1] To date.

Customers will also be advised of progress by telephone but no summary records are kept of this means of notification.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 210W, concerning the DVLA, how many people currently have an application with the DVLA for a (a) car and motorcycle and (b) lorry and bus licence in which the applicant declared a medical condition, which has been outstanding for longer than the published standards of five to seven weeks. [106717]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 24 January 2000]: The Agency deals with an annual total of some 320,000 applicants and notifications, involving medical investigations. At close of business on 20 January 2000, there were (a) 33,699 car and motorcycle and (b) 1,881 lorry and bus transactions which had been outstanding for longer than the published standards. This includes drivers who have notified a medical condition but are not currently applying for a licence.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each shire county, the SSA and actual expenditure, with the deviation as a percentage of SSA for (a) social services and (b) education for each year for which data are available since 1990–91. [106558]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The requested information has been placed in the Library of the House.

Driving Licences

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of allowing applicants for driving licences to present alternative forms of identification from those currently required; and if he will make a statement. [106680]

Mr. Hill: The documents required in support of a photocard driving licence application have been agreed by the Ministerial Group on Welfare Reform. The requirements are the same for all driving licence applicants and are in line with Government policy on combating welfare fraud. To accept alternative documents from certain applicants would mean different standards of identity checking and a two-tier system.

A more flexible arrangement to assist individuals whose cases are under consideration by the Immigration and Nationality Department of the Home Office is being looked into as a temporary measure.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assistance is offered to applicants for driving licences who are awaiting the issue of travel documents or naturalisation papers by the Home Office, in proving their identity for the purpose of obtaining driving licences; and if he will make a statement. [106683]

Mr. Hill: Driving licence applicants who are awaiting the issue of travel documents or naturalisation papers by the Home Office are advised to contact the Home Office to ask for confirmation of details to be provided for driving licence application purposes.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements are in place to assist applicants for driving licences who cannot produce the original documents required to prove their identity, due to these being (a) held, and (b) not yet issued by the Immigration and Nationality Department for immigration or nationality purposes; and if he will make a statement. [106684]

Mr. Hill: Driving licence applicants whose documents are being held or not yet issued by the Immigration and Nationality Department are advised to contact that Department to ask for confirmation of details to be provided for driving licence application purposes.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications for driving licences were not proceeded with in the last year for which figures are available because the applicant was unable to produce the necessary identification on the grounds that it was (a) being held and (b) had not been issued by the Immigration and Nationality Department; and if he will made a statement. [106682]

Mr. Hill: Since August 1999, following Home Office advice on evidence of identity some 7,500 photocard driving licence applications have been rejected because the applicant was unable to produce the necessary identification on the grounds that (a) it was being held or (b) had not been issued by the Home Office. It should be noted that those persons included in (b) may never become eligible for the issue of a necessary identity document by the Home Office.

Air Service Agreements

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the balance of benefits to the United Kingdom regions and to the South East of England in pursuing a mini-deal on transatlantic bilateral air service agreements with the USA. [106788]

Mr. Mullin: Transatlantic air services between the UK and the US are governed by the provisions of an air services agreement, commonly referred to as Bermuda II. The Government will contemplate changes to Bermuda II only on terms which are no less advantageous to the generality of UK interests than to US interests. In determining this balance, the Government have regard not only to the interests of airlines but to the interests of airports (London and regional), the regions in which those airports are situated and the interests of consumers. This approach has guided the Government's consideration of a range of options for a possible mini-deal during the current round of talks.

Airlines

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what progress he is making towards eliminating restriction on the ability of United Kingdom and foreign airlines to serve United Kingdom regional airports without the need for bilateral negotiations; [106789]

(2) what is his policy on the applications for fifth freedom rights from foreign airlines wishing to serve Manchester airport; and if he will make a statement on how wider regional interests are taken into account in the process of deciding the award of fifth freedoms to air carriers. [106786]

Mr. Mullin: In June 1998 we offered to bilateral partners with whom we did not already have liberal agreements unrestricted third/fourth freedom access to all UK airports (except Heathrow and Gatwick) as long as UK airlines were also allowed to operate on the same routes. Fifth freedom rights were not included in the offer and remain subject to negotiation although in evaluating exchanges of rights we do take account of possible regional economic benefits. In the Department's response to the Select Committee on Environment, Transport and the Regions report on Access to Regional Airports we undertook to review this policy. Officials have consulted interested parties and a response will shortly be made to the Select Committee.

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his timetable for achieving full liberalisation of air service agreements. [106787]

Mr. Mullin: It is impossible to set a timetable for achieving full liberalisation of air services agreements as this is dependent on bilateral partners. Liberal air service arrangements are already in place with EEA States and a number of other states and officials seek to liberalise our arrangements in other air services negotiations.

Portsmouth Harbour

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what grounds he rejected the representations from the applicants for the proposed Portsmouth Harbour (Gunwharf Quays) (Millennium Tower) Order concerning the objections to this Order due to be received by him by 20 December; what criteria he uses to make such decisions; and how much time he will give the applicants to revise their representations. [106804]

Mr. Hill: The application by the Berkeley Festival Waterfront Company Ltd. for powers to construct the Millennium Tower is subject to the written representations procedure under the Transport and Works Act 1992. The applicants complied with the first stage of this procedure on 20 December by sending to the Department representations on each objection to their application. They did not, however, include in their representations information which had been sought by the Department concerning the proposed use of the Tower. We need to be satisfied that the essential purpose of the Tower would fall within the definition of an observation structure, in order to establish that it would be within the powers of the 1992 Act to make the proposed Order. It would not be appropriate to progress the application further until this fundamental issue has been addressed. We expect the applicants to respond shortly on this issue.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105873]

Ms Armstrong [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 24 January 2000, Official Report, columns 117–18W.

Trains (Deaths)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people were killed by trains in each year since 1995; and what estimate he has made of how many such deaths were suicides. [106704]

Mr. Hill: For the period 1 April 1995–31 March 1999, the number of people killed by trains was:

Year	Total fatalities	Suicides	Passenger fatalities in train accidents
1995–96	249	131	1
1996–97	249	119	1
1997–98	278	147	7
1998–99	254	123	0

The figures include all fatalities due to train accidents and the movement of trains reported to the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE's) HM Railway Inspectorate. However, 1998–99 was the first time in 5 years (ie since privatisation) that no passenger was killed in a train accident.

The figures for suicides are included in the total fatalities figures. The total figures also include fatalities to trespassers which have averaged well over 100 a year. The figures in this table are based on published statistics, subject to subsequent change by Coroners verdicts, which are contained in the HSE Chief Inspector of Railways' Annual Reports on Railway Safety for Great Britain, and are available in the House Library.

Private Hire Vehicles

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in respect of restoring the position on private hire vehicles which existed prior to the decision in the case of Benson v. Copeland Borough Council concerning the personal use of a private hire vehicle by the spouse of the licence holder. [106464]

Mr. Hill: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas), on 21 December 1999 Official Report, column 521W.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of his Department's staff were (a) registered disabled, (b) women, (c) from ethnic minorities and (d) from (i) independent, (ii) grammar and (iii) other schools in (1) 1970, (2) 1979, (3) 1989 and (4) 1999. [106764]

Ms Beverley Hughes: As of the end of 1999 the percentages in the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions (including its Agencies) were 3 per cent. disabled staff, 46 per cent. women and 5.2 per cent. ethnic minority staff.

Figures for 1970, 1979 and 1989 are not available due to the merging of the former Departments of Environment and Transport in 1997 and the formation of the Agencies and Government Offices. Similarly, although records of staff members' educational qualifications and the institutions from which they attained them are now kept, no record is kept of the type of school attended.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to ensure that Wales is placed within a single franchise area when railway franchises are next allocated. [107017]

Mr. Hill: As part of his preparations for franchise replacement, the Franchising Director has invited proposals for improved services in Wales and the North West. These need not necessarily be based on the existing franchise map. In any re-negotiations the Franchising Director will seek the best deal he can for passengers, in line with the Instructions and Guidance the Deputy Prime Minister gave him last year. The Franchising Director has consulted interested parties, including the Welsh Assembly, and will continue to do during the re-negotiation process.

PRIME MINISTER

Security Services

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister under what circumstances expenditure by the security services can be incurred outside the funds allocated to the Single Intelligence Vote; and if he will make a statement. [106653]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 January 2000]: None.

Policy Unit

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Prime Minister how many members of staff at the Number 10 Policy Unit are employed as experts on (a) non-European international affairs and (b) African affairs. [106987]

The Prime Minister: None.

Arms Exports

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the compliance of the export of spare parts for British made Hawk Jets with (a) criterion 4 and (b) criterion 8 of the EU Code of Conduct for Arms Exports. [107018]

The Prime Minister: Licences to export arms and other goods whose export is controlled for strategic reasons are issued by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry acting through the Export Control Organisation (ECO) of the Department of Trade and Industry. All relevant individual licence applications are circulated by the DTI to other Government Departments with an interest as determined by those Departments in line with their policy responsibilities. These include the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Ministry of Defence and Department for International Development.

All applications for licences to export goods entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List, are assessed against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29W, and European Union Code of Conduct of Arms Exports, including Criteria 4 and 8.

Intelligence and Security Committee

Kali Mountford: To ask the Prime Minister when he will respond to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual report for 1998–99. [107650]

The Prime Minister: I intend to present the Government response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Report before Parliament tomorrow.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment

19. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on inward investment in the UK. [105768]

Mr. Caborn: The UK had another record year for attracting inward investment projects in 1998–99. The Invest in Britain Bureau recorded 652 decision to invest in the UK with almost 119,000 associated jobs. These figures are underscored by latest Office for National Statistics data which show that at the end of the third quarter 1999, the total stock of inward investment in the UK amounted to £222 billion, an increase of 21 per cent. over the previous year.

The UK remains the number 1 location in Europe for inward investment and this Government are committed to providing a stable economic framework to ensure that the UK stays ahead of its competitors.

Metrication

20. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy on metrication. [105769]

Dr. Howells: The Government are taking forward the policy adopted by successive Governments since 1965 of overseeing the change to metric units as the primary system of measurement in the United Kingdom. A report by my Department on the progress since 1965, particularly for goods sold by weight or measure, was placed in the Library of the House on 23 July last year.

E-Commerce

21. Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to provide a network of support for those businesses which trade on the internet. [105770]

Ms Hewitt: We have established a network of 100 Support centres throughout the UK under the Information Society Initiative (ISI) at which businesses can get impartial, jargon-free advice and support. In England, these Centres will be fully integrated into the new Small Business Service.

We are also working with a newly formed Digital Content Forum on an action plan for growth in this rapidly developing sector which includes many of the key content and service providers for e-commerce based businesses.

Beyond this, work is under way to develop a new, industry led mentoring scheme for internet based start ups, building on recommendations in the Performance and Innovation Unit's report "e-commerce@its.best.uk".

22. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what account he has taken in framing his policy on e-commerce, of representations received from the IT industry. [105771]

Ms Hewitt: The report "e-commerce@its.best.uk", launched by the Prime Minister in September 1999, sets out the Government's e-commerce strategy. In preparing this report, extensive consultation took place with representatives from the IT industry among others.

In general terms, the Government meet regularly to discuss e-commerce policy with the Information Age Partnership, in which business leaders from the IT industry participate.

23. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that the UK is among the world leaders in the exploitation of IT. [105772]

Ms Hewitt: We are determined to make the UK the best place in the world for Information Technology and e-commerce. The Government's vision and strategy for e-commerce is set out in the report "e-commerce@its.best.uk", which was launched by the Prime Minister in September.

The Electronic Communications Bill, currently in committee stage, will give digital signatures legal parity with their written equivalents and will put wholly electronic contracts on a sound legal footing.

30. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure the security and privacy of internet transactions. [105780]

Ms Hewitt: Government alone cannot ensure the privacy and the security of the internet. We are, however, taking steps to ensure that both business and the public have the tools at their disposal to address their own needs. In particular we have introduced the Electronic Communications Bill, which will both promote the use of electronic signatures and encryption, and enhance the availability of cryptographic support services, such as the issue of authentication certificates. The Department has also been involved in the creation and promulgation of BS7799, the standard for Information Security Management, which is now recognised internationally as an important tool for business in securing their internet transactions. Finally the 1998 Data Protection Act, which will be implemented later this year, ensures that all those who process customer data have to adopt mechanisms to safeguard its privacy.

Post Offices

24. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to assist rural sub-post offices. [105773]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government are making a substantial contribution to the costs of automating the entire post office counters network to strengthen the viability of the network as a whole. Automation will enable Post Office Counters Ltd. to offer substantial enhancements to the services it is able to offer to clients and customers which in turn will increase the attractiveness of post offices compared with other service delivery channels. In addition, the Performance and Innovation in the Cabinet Office is carrying out an urgent study on the post office network. Various rate relief schemes already apply to many rural post offices.

National Minimum Wage

25. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the level of the national minimum wage. [105774]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Any future changes to the national minimum wage will be made sensibly and taking account of the economic conditions prevailing at the time.

28. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received concerning the level of the minimum wage. [105778]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My Department has received a small number of representations on this issue in the past few weeks. Any future changes to the national minimum wage will be made sensibly and taking account of the economic conditions prevailing at the time.

Telecommunications

26. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations were held with (a) local authorities and (b) the cable telecommunications industry prior to the laying before Parliament of the Telecommunications (Licence Modifications) (Cable-Local Delivery Operators Licences) Regulations 1999 in relation to the effects of the regulations on local authorities plans to control the height and width of roadside cable telecommunications cabinets; and if he will make a statement. [105775]

Ms Hewitt: Telecommunication operators, the Local Government Association and other interested bodies were first consulted on the changes planned to telecommunication licences in November 1997. These changes came into force on 27 September 1999. There were no specific consultations on the maximum size of street cabinets as the proposed measurements had at the date of consultation already become the standard for new licences.

Furthermore, the licences do not alter the limitations of what operators may do within the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995. Cabinets which are larger than that permitted under that Order require planning permission.

Pollution

27. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about integrated pollution prevention and control changes; and if he will make a statement. [105776]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has received a small number of representations concerning integrated pollution prevention and control changes.

Representations on issues including scope, timing and charges have also been made to officials in the Department of Trade and Industry.

DTI officials have discussed industry concerns with officials in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. DETR is responsible for regulations implementing integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) on a phased basis in England and Wales. These are expected to be laid and to come into force later this year.

However, the application of the IPPC Directive to offshore combustion installations is the responsibility of the DTI and was part of a wider public consultation exercise on the future of the offshore oil and gas environmental regime undertaken in the spring of 1999. A further consultation on the regulations covering offshore combustion installations was initiated in December 1999.

Science Parks

29. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions his Department is taking to promote science parks based at leading universities. [105779]

Ms Hewitt: The Government are wholly aware of the importance of business incubation and science parks and has provided £35 million to set up UK Business Incubation as a centre for promoting best practice among fledging companies. The centre acts as a catalyst to extract the maximum benefit from the business incubation process in the UK by promoting best practices, better networking, and encouraging uptake of business incubation. Turning to science parks there over 60 science parks in the UK, including Cambridge, Aston, Durham and Coventry; the majority are based in or around major universities. There are close links between the parks and universities which strengthen the transfer of technology and business skills in order to foster the development and growth of business.

Out-of-town Supermarkets

31. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Government's competition policy in relation to out-of-town supermarkets. [105781]

Dr. Howells: The Competition Commission is currently investigating the supply of groceries in the UK. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on matters which may form part of the Commission's inquiry.

Scientific Research

32. Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to enable the longer-term planning of Government-funded scientific research. [105782]

Ms Hewitt: As a result of the Government's decision in the Comprehensive Spending Review to allocate money for three years instead of one, Departments and Research Councils can now plan ahead with more certainty than before.

The Government confirmed, in their response of 13 September 1999 to the July 1999 report by the Council for Science and Technology (CST) of its review of science and technology across Government, that it fully accepted the advice that Departments should adopt a more strategic forward-looking approach to science and technology. The response noted that many departments already made substantial efforts here and went a long way towards meeting the recommendation but accepted that there was more that could be done.

Many Departments are already closely engaged with the UK Foresight programme which aims to develop a culture of forward thinking on science and technology. In response to the CST report, Departments will decide how to make better use of Foresight as part of the development of their science and technology strategies. Work to implement this and other recommendations from the Council for Science and Technology's report is ongoing as part of wider work on a science and innovation strategy.

Manufactured Goods

33. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on prospects for trade in manufactured goods between Britain and its European Union partners. [105783]

Mr. Caborn: The prospects for trade with our European Union partners are improving. Respected forecasters expect that market growth across the European Union will strengthen this year. This is already reflected in better export figures, which show that in the three months to November the value of exports to Germany, our main European Union trading partner, were 4 per cent. higher than the previous three months.

The CBI survey of manufacturers shows that optimism about export prospects for the coming 12 months is positive for the first time since October 1996, suggesting that companies share this view.

TransTec

34. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to recover Government grants to TransTec; and if he will make a statement. [105784]

Mr. Caborn: Details of the Department's dealings with businesses over grants are confidential.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much public money has been given by his Department to TransTec since its establishment in (a) grants and (b) loans. [105635]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 18 January 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on 25 January 2000, Official Report, columns 205–06W.

Science Base

35. Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that the exploitation of the UK science base will lead to increased wealth and job creation. [105785]

Ms Hewitt: The Government are committed to encouraging the exploitation of the UK science base and spending on this sector has increased steadily over the last few years. A number of schemes have been set up to encourage the development and exploitation of research which will place the UK at the cutting edge of technology thereby increasing its ability to compete in the 21st Century and in so doing boosting the economy and creating jobs.

Renewable Energy

36. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will be announcing new measures to help renewable energy producers. [105786]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government intend to make a statement on new and renewable energy shortly, at the time of the Second Reading of the Utilities Bill.

Synchrotron

37. Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement on the location of the new synchrotron. [105787]

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his reply to Parliamentary Question 99739, dated 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 164W, said that he would make a final decision as to the location of the new synchrotron in the light of all the evidence and announce it by mid January. He is currently evaluating all the information available and will be making the announcement in the near future.

Cluster Developments

38. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to promote cluster developments. [105788]

Ms Hewitt: The Government attach considerable importance to clusters and are currently putting in place new mechanisms for taking forward the development of its clusters policy. These include a Clusters Policy Steering Group to be chaired by my noble friend Lord Sainsbury, the Minister for Science and a full mapping study of cluster activity in the UK. Membership of the Steering Group and the successful bidders for the mapping study will be announced shortly.

Miners Compensation

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in meeting retired miners health-related compensation claims. [105767]

Mrs. Liddell: We have made over 6,000 offers based on spirometry testing and so far 927 claimants have accepted. Over 16,000 individual interim payments have been made. So far over £45 million in compensation has been paid to ex-miners and their families. The first full medical assessments have begun and we anticipate that substantial numbers of offers will rapidly follow.

In addition we have settled over 10,000 claims for Vibration White Finger and paid out over £63 million in compensation to ex-miners.

Mr. Denis Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress his Department is making in relation to the settlement of damages claims made by former mineworkers for chronic bronchitis and emphysema; how many claims have been (a) received and (b) settled; and what action is being taken to ensure the speedy processing of the outstanding claims. [106931]

Mrs. Liddell: As at 25 January, the Department has received 94,011 claims of which 1,047 have been settled in full and final payment. In addition the Department has made 16,390 interim payments to ex-miners and their families. To date over £46 million has been paid in damages.

Some 39,479 screening spirometry tests have now been conducted meeting the required target when the contract was let. Screening spirometry should be completed for the vast majority of remaining claimants by March 2000.

Eight centres have so far been established to provide the services for the full Medical Assessment Process and 23 teams are currently engaged in collecting medical records. A total of 25 centres will be established by the end of February 2000. The first assessments have begun and the infrastructure is in place to process claims fully in accordance with the Handling Agreement reached with the solicitors representing former miners.

Phthalates

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will quantify the risk his Department assesses can be posed to young children from the ingestion of phthalates. [106965]

Dr. Howells: The European Commission's independent Scientific Committee on Toxicity, Ecotoxicity and the Environment (SCTEE) was consulted on the use of six phthalates in toys and child care articles intended to be mouthed. It concluded that these phthalates could be safely used, provided that any leaching from the toy or child care article did not exceed scientifically established tolerable daily intake (TDI) levels. The DTI, on the advice of the Department of Health, has supported the SCTEE conclusions with regard to DINP. As well as being subject to a very high safety margin for use, there is considerable evidence to indicate that humans are much less sensitive to the liver toxicity which rats exposed to extremely high doses demonstrate. Where the UK does consider there may be cause for greater EU-wide restrictions is in the use of another phthalate, DEHP, where scientific concerns have been raised. DEHP is not used in toys in the UK.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason he does not support a ban on phthalates in toys which are not designed to be sucked or chewed by young children but could be. [106968]

Dr. Howells: The Government have taken their steer from the European Commission's independent Scientific Committee on Toxicity, Ecotoxicity and the Environment (SCTEE). The SCTEE has held that, provided migration does not exceed scientifically established levels, phthalates can be safely used. Testing has shown that products currently on UK shelves do not give any cause for concern. However, given public concern, and to try to bring in a harmonised EU approach, the Commission introduced a Decision, supported by all member states, to ban phthalates in items intended to be mouthed by small children. Phthalates leach only with difficulty, requiring very prolonged chewing before they are dislodged. When we consider the science and the risks, the ban reflects a very cautious approach. Had the science indicated otherwise, the Commission would have proposed a more stringent measure than the current ban.

Drug Companies (Mergers)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from (a) Glaxo Wellcome, (b) SmithKline Beecham and (c) other drug companies about the proposed merger between Glaxo Wellcome and SmithKline Beecham. [106144]

Dr. Howells: This Department has received one representation on the proposed merger. It is not our policy to disclose the identity of those who make representations on cases so that interested parties may comment freely without any concern that their comments might then be disclosed. Any such representations are forwarded to the Director General of Fair Trading who will take them into account in his advice to this Department on the case.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he has had with the Secretary of State for Health on the likely impact of the merger of SmithKline Beecham and Glaxo Wellcome on (a) the price and availability of (i) prescription and (ii) non-prescription medicines and (b) competition among health service suppliers. [106145]

Dr. Howells: The Director General of Fair Trading will consult interested parties about the proposed merger and will advise this Department on the case in due course. His advice will take into account any comments on these issues that he has received from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Clean Coal Technology

Mr. Denis Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was spent by the Government in each of the last five financial years on the research and development of clean coal technology. [106934]

Mrs. Liddell: The expenditure by my Department in respect of research and development of cleaner coal technologies is shown in the table.

Year	£ million
1994–95	8.0
1995–96	7.8
1996–97	6.9
1997–98	3.1
1998–99	2.9

Note:
Provision for 1999–2000 is £3.7 million, and planned expenditure for 2000–01, as published in Energy Paper 67, is £4.0 million. All figures are net.

Photovoltaics

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment he has made of the potential long-term economic benefits of supporting renewable energy sources, with particular reference to photovoltaics, on the basis of the German model; [106782]

(2) what assessment he has made of the potential for photovoltaics in reducing carbon emissions in the United Kingdom on the basis of a support scheme for renewable energy similar to the German model. [106783]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a recent assessment of the potential for renewable energy, including photovoltaics, commissioned by my Department. This has been reported in "New and Renewable Energy: Prospects in the UK for the 21st Century". "Supporting analysis, March 1999—ETSUR-122", a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House shortly; this is also available on the Departmental website at www.dti.gov.uk/renew/condoc. This includes information on the potential for reducing carbon emissions and the economics of renewables.

We have not carried out any specified assessments looking at the German model, but the cost to the German taxpayer of the interest free loans being offered in support of the 100,000 roofs programme is estimated at around £300 million for an installed capacity of 300 MW. Several German cities and utilities are also offering premium rates—up to 2DM (70p) a unit—to householders exporting electricity to the grid from PV systems. These extra costs are spread over the remaining majority of electricity consumers in those areas.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice his Department gives to those businesses in areas which have ceased to be eligible for regional assistance since 1 January. [106515]

Mr. Caborn: Financial assistance to industry outside England is a matter for the devolved administrations. In England, we have given advice that while discussions continue with the Commission over the new Assisted Areas map, Government Offices will, as a temporary measure, continue to receive applications for RSA from businesses located in the Assisted Areas proposed in July 1999. Government Offices will undertake a full appraisal of such cases but any offers of financial assistance will be conditional on confirmation from the Commission that the location is within the approved map and that the project complies with the appropriate aid ceilings for that area. Similar arrangements are in place in Wales and Scotland. Any area which is outside the Assisted Areas when the map is approved will not be eligible for RSA under Community law. However, in the English regions we have introduced new tier 3 areas which include areas of need outside the Assisted Areas proposed to the Commission. In tier 3, qualifying SMEs may apply for financial assistance from a new discretionary Enterprise Grant scheme.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the public expenditure on the ECGD's business for (a) 1998–99, (b) 1999–2000,

(c) 2000–01 and (d) 2001–02, (i) in aggregate, (ii) with highly indebted land mine developing countries and (iii) related to defence. [105418]

Mr. Caborn: Aggregate public expenditure on ECGD operations is estimated as:

Year	£ million
1998–99	[1]318.7
1999–2000	1,025.4
2000–01	947
2001–02	947

[1] Outturn

These public expenditure estimates relate to a number of financial facilities which ECGD provides in support of its main trading operations. The vast majority of the amounts relate to the refinancing with public funds of export finance loans and will be repaid as the loans mature. The balance is accounted for by the cost of interest rate support to banks under ECGD's Fixed Rate Export Finance (FREF) Scheme.

Costs arising from these public expenditure facilities are not estimated or recorded on a basis which allows them to be broken down by country or industrial sector. Fuller details of these facilities can however be found in ECGD's Annual Report and Trading Accounts for 1998–99 of which there is a copy in the Library of the House.

ECGD's main trading operations are not scored against public expenditure since ECGD looks to cover the cost of claims arising from this business through premium and recoveries of claims paid.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the (a) countries and (b) bodies which have bought arms from the United Kingdom in the last five years under the export credits guarantee scheme and defaulted on their payments, indicating the amounts involved in each case. [105337]

Mr. Caborn: The only defence business covered by ECGD in the last five years where the country has subsequently defaulted was with Indonesia. The value of defence business in the last five years to Indonesia is £529 million and the current value of the defaults on this business is £55.9 million.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the estimate prepared for the Defence Committee concerning annual ECGD net costs attributable to arms exports. [105338]

Mr. Caborn: I refer the hon. Member to the response by my hon. Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement on behalf of the Government to the House of Commons Defence Commitment's Report of 31 March 1999. This welcomed the Committee's invitation to the Ministry of Defence to undertake further work on the costs and benefits to the UK economy of defence exports. This analysis, which will include ECGD costs, is under way and the results will be published in due course.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support the Export Credits Guarantees Department has given for Land Rover to establish a licensed production agreement with Otakar in Turkey; and if ECGD support contained (a) export control and (b) human rights criteria. [104159]

Mr. Caborn: In March 1998 ECGD finally concluded financing arrangements through the Supplier Credit Facility in relation to Land Rover's supply to Otakar in Turkey. The financing arrangements, inter alia, include a specific condition that Land Rover has to provide a warranty that all relevant government approvals including export licences where appropriate have been obtained and remain valid.

Production equipment and technology, components and sub-assemblies whose export from the UK is subject to control are set out in a range of headings in the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, as amended, and the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996, as amended and Council decision 94/942/CFSP, as amended (which has effect through Council Regulation (EC) 3381/94). While a valid export licence is needed for the export of controlled goods or technology, exporters are not required to obtain one before they conclude an agreement for production overseas.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the sum paid out in claims authorised by the Export Credits Guarantee Department on exports to Nigeria between 1996–97 and 1998–99 was for defence-related exports. [105930]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 24 January 2000]: None of the claims authorised between 1996–97 and 1998–99 were for defence-related exports.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what amount of money underwritten by the Export Credits Guarantee Department in each of the past 10 years for defence-related equipment has been claimed by manufacturers but not recovered from (a) Indonesia, (b) Jordan, (c) Kenya, (d) Egypt and (e) Algeria. [105935]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 24 January 2000]: From information readily available, the balances of claims outstanding for defence-related exports are as follows:

	£ million
Indonesia	131
Jordan	253
Kenya	16
Egypt	46
Algeria	98

Energy Safety Management Audit

Ms Southworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Health and Safety Executive will publish its report on the Safety Management Audit of British Energy. [107558]

Mrs. Liddell: I understand that HSE's report, 'Safety Management of British Energy Generation Limited' and 'British Energy Generation (UK) Limited', has been published today. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

North Yorkshire Power Line

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Lackenby to Norton overhead power line will be removed. [107559]

Mrs. Liddell: Although approval for the North Yorkshire Power Line was given in March 1998 there was an error in the consent documentation resulting in a gap in the line of approximately 160 metres. The filling of this gap had to be the subject of a lengthy legal process, including public consultation. Having considered the representations following that consultation, I have concluded, first, that there is no need to hold a public inquiry before making a decision in respect of this gap in the consents for the line, and second, that it is reasonable to grant the National Grid Company consent for the section of line which was not granted on initial consideration in 1998.

While this decision resolves the matter of the "gap", there are still a number of issues to be resolved before the National Grid Company can begin the construction of the new line and the dismantling of the existing one.

Copies of the Press Notice and decision letter are being placed in the Library of the House.

Export Licences (RDX)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which company, organisation or individual in China was to receive the raw RDX for which a standard individual export licence was issued between 7 May and 10 November 1999. [106440]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: As set out in my letter of 23 September, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, the stated end-use for the RDX in its raw form covered by the licence was wellhead abandonment and oilfield use. The enduser was Halliburton International Inc., and I am disclosing this information in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

UK Competitiveness Indicators

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the factors underlying the conclusions of his report, "UK Competitiveness Indicators 1999", on (a) working hours and (b) per capita national income in the UK, in relation to that in other G7 countries. [106530]

Mr. Byers: The analysis underlying "UK competitiveness Indicators 1999" showed that, on average, we work more hours than our main European competitors and yet we achieve a lower national income per head. The analysis showed that, in comparison to France and Germany, both the proportion of population in employment in the UK and the number of hours worked per person employed are relatively high. Despite this, poor productivity means that GDP per head is some 18 per cent. below the average for the G7. The factors underlying this are assessed in "UK Competitiveness Indicators 1999". Closing the gap will require improvements in several areas, including innovation performance, management and work force skills, and entrepreneurship.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105871]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 24 January 2000, Official Report, columns 117–18W.

EU Structural Funds

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which areas of Newcastle upon Tyne receive (a) the maximum level of state support and (b) the full level of Objective 2 support from the European Union; and which areas will receive the maximum levels of support in each category in the next financial year. [106706]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 25 January 2000]: The maximum level of state support permitted under Community Law in the English regions is available in areas designated under the terms of Article 87(3)A of the Treaty of Rome. There are no such areas in Newcastle upon Tyne, nor will there be in the next Financial Year. Under proposals which are currently awaiting final endorsement from Brussels Objective 2 support will be available in all areas of Newcastle upon Tyne except for the Wards of Castle and Westerhope.

Fuel Poverty

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer of 26 November 1999, Official Report, column 210W, on fuel poverty (1) if he will indicate the date of the first meeting of the inter-ministerial group to examine fuel poverty; [105470]

(2) if he will list the membership of the inter-ministerial group to examine fuel poverty. [105469]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answers 25 January 2000]: The Group met on Wednesday 19 January 2000. It is jointly chaired by myself and my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The other members are: my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office; my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury; my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health; the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), and Callum McCarthy, Director General of the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets.

The Group discussed and agreed its terms of reference and objective, and approved a programme of work. The agreed terms of reference are:

> To take a strategic overview to ensure policies and new initiatives with a bearing on fuel poverty are co-ordinated across Government and integrated with the activities of relevant external bodies, such as the regulator and the energy industries.

The Group's objective is:

> "To develop and publish a strategy setting out the Government's fuel poverty objectives, targets for acnieving those objectives, the policies to deliver those objectives, and how progress should be monitored".

The programme of work to take these forward was agreed as:

To improve identification of the fuel poor.

To research the effect of changes in income, energy prices and energy efficiency on the number of fuel poor.

To identify the projected impact of existing and planned policies on the fuel poor.

To develop an understanding of the gap between the impact of existing and planned policies and fuel poverty objectives, and the policies and resources required to meet objectives.

To develop a comprehensive strategy, setting out Government fuel poverty objectives, policies to deliver them, and targets and timescales for those objectives.

To identify areas where further work is needed to ensure co-ordination of Government policy activity among the various different players, and setting up mechanisms to take this work forward.

To establish methods of developing indicators, monitoring progress, and evaluating outcomes.

Oil and Gas (Scotland)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has made of the percentage of oil and gas produced in Scottish waters which is landed outside Scotland; [106578]

(2) if he will list the fields in Scottish waters which produce oil and gas that is landed outside Scotland, stating the licence holder for the field in each case. [106577]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 25 January 2000]: My Department publishes an annual report "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the Library of the House. This lists all the oil and gas fields on the UK Continental Shelf. In each case it shows the location of the field, the operator and how the product is transported from the field. In the case of gas, and of oil sent through a pipeline, the place where the product is landed is given. The "Scottish area" within which offshore platforms are subject to Scots law is defined in the Civil Jurisdiction (Offshore Activities) Order 1987, which has effect under section 11 of the Petroleum Act 1998.

Where the oil is taken off the field by tanker the movements involved are too complex to be listed in full in the Department's annual report. Nor is the information asked for by the hon. Member routinely produced by my Department, or could be except at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Murder Inquiry (Robert Hamill)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish an independent judicial inquiry under the Tribunal of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 into the murder of Robert Hamill. [105353]

Mr. Ingram: While an inquiry has not been ruled out by Government, they will not consider the issue until disciplinary proceedings, if any, against police officers are concluded.

RUC School Visits

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the (a) pre-school institutions, (b) primary and (c) secondary schools visited by the RUC and police community relations units in 1999. [105454]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: During 1999, RUC Community Affairs officers delivered Police Education Programme lessons to 335 primary schools and 52 secondary schools. No records were kept of pre-school visits.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what efforts are made to secure parental consent prior to school visits by the RUC. [105455]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The Police Education Programme (PEP) is delivered by police officers attached to the Community Affairs Branch. Any police involvement with and support to a school is agreed through the school principal.

Decommissioning

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the meetings held between the International Independent Commission on Decommissioning with the representatives of each political party and the authorised representatives of each paramilitary organisation since 1 November 1999. [105816]

Mr. Ingram: This is entirely a matter for the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, which carries out its functions independent of Government. It is their policy not to disclose this type of information.

Firearms Database

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the RUC firearms database is linked into the National Firearms Database established under Section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997. [105819]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 18 January 2000]: The following table shows the number of legally held handguns stolen from private individuals, the Armed Forces, the Police and Prison Officers in each of the last 10 years.

Year	Private individuals	Armed Forces	Police Officers	Prison Officers
1990	0	6	15	4
1991	8	5	12	2
1992	3	5	3	1
1993	7	1	5	0
1994	12	6	14	0
1995	7	2	6	0
1996	7	4	6	1
1997	11	1	2	0
1998	16	2	6	0
1999	7	1	1	1
Totals	78	33	70	9

During this period one rifle was stolen from a police officer.

The Chief Constable has advised that the information in relation to the calibres of these firearms is not easily accessible and obtaining it would incur disproportionate cost.

Union Flag

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what days in the last year the Union Flag was flown (a) from the headquarters of each public body, (b) at each RUC station and (c) in each school authority. [101873]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 December 1999]: The Union Flag has been flown at each RUC station on the following occasions over the past year:

6 February 1999: Her Majesty's Accession

8 February 1999: Death of King Hussein of Jordan

19 February 1999: Birthday of HRH the Prince of York

8 March 1999: Commonwealth Day

10 March 1999: Birthday of HRH the Earl of Wessex

21 April 1999: Birthday of Her Majesty the Queen

21 August 1999: Birthday of HRH the Princess Margaret

14 November 1999: Birthday of HRH the Prince of Wales/Remembrance Day

20 November 1999: Anniversary of Her Majesty's Wedding.

The flying of the Union Flag from the Headquarters of each public body and school authority is no longer the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Firearms Certificates

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which system is used by the RUC to hold their register of privately held firearms and persons holding firearms certificates; and if he will place a copy of the system's functional specification and user guide in the Library. [105822]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 18 January 2000]: The Chief Constable has advised that the current system used by the RUC to hold this information was developed by them following research into similar systems operated by GB forces. There are no plans to place the system documentation in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Embargoes

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the binding embargoes agreed by the European Union since 1990, indicating for each the period of the embargo and any arrangements made for extension of the period of validity of export licences to those countries to reflect the period of embargo. [103555]

Mr. Vaz: I will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

EU Procedures

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the guidance handbooks on the institutions of the European Union and on the procedures of the Council prepared by his Department for civil servants and Ministers. [106162]

Mr. Vaz: These guidance handbooks were prepared for the use of UK officials and Ministers directly involved in EU negotiations. We consider giving them wider circulation could be prejudicial to the UK's position in EU negotiations.

Lebanon

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the UN and his international counterparts concerning UN Resolution 520 on the removal of Syrian and Israeli forces from the Lebanon. [106649]

Mr. Hain: I have regular discussions with a wide range of interlocutors about the peace process in the Middle East. In the case of Lebanon, the Government support United Nations Security Council Resolutions 520 and 425, and believe there is now a real prospect of withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon. We look forward to the Lebanese Government's full exercise of its authority throughout the country. The Government also hope that peace negotiations between Israel and Lebanon will begin as soon as possible.

Cameroon

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on human rights abuses in Cameroon. [106861]

Mr. Hain: We have serious concerns about the human rights situation in Cameroon, and believe they are in breach of the Commonwealth's Harare Declaration Principles on Human Rights and Good Governance.

We have raised our concerns with the Government of Cameroon, both bilaterally and with EU partners, and are working with the Commonwealth and other international partners to encourage reform.

Malaysia

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Malaysian authorities on the detention of Karpal Singh. [106527]

Mr. Battle: Karpal Singh, the Deputy Chairman of the Democratic Action Party (DAP) and a lawyer for Anwar Ibrahim, the former deputy Prime Minister, was arrested on 12 January. He has been accused of making seditious comments in court during the Anwar trial. He has been released on bail.

This case raises significant legal issues, and we shall be following it closely. We are in regular contact with the Malaysian authorities on such matters.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on the detention and trial of Kayed Singh in Malaysia. [106526]

Mr. Battle: None.

Entry Clearance Refusals

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for entry clearance to visit the United Kingdom have been made at the British post in Havana in each of the last 10 years; and how many of those applications have been refused. [106869]

Mr. Vaz: Statistics on visit visa applications processed by the visa section in Havana have been collated only since 1993. The figures are as follows:

Year	Received	Refused
1993	871	[1]—
1994	901	[1]—
1995	2,062	65
1996	1,455	63
1997	1,772	103
1998	2,026	94
1999	2,234	145

[1] Not available

The figures for refusals in 1993 and 1994 were not recorded. The 1999 figures are provisional: final statistics for 1999 are currently being compiled.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people were refused entry clearance to United Kingdom as visitors in 1998 on the grounds that the entry clearance officer did not believe that the applicant intended to leave the United Kingdom at the end of their visit. [106819]

Mr. Vaz: "Intention to leave the UK" is one of the key tests in the Immigration Rules on which an ECO must be satisfied. Most short-term visit refusals will include this as one of the grounds for an application being unsuccessful. However, detailed information on the reasons for refusal is not collated centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Indonesia

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent (a) reports and (b) representations he has received on violations of human rights by the Indonesian Army in Aceh and West Papua. [106728]

Mr. Battle: Despite the progress towards democracy in Indonesia, the security situation in Aceh and West Papua/Irian Jaya is a matter of serious concern. We have received reports of indiscriminate killings, abductions and harassment in Aceh, and we have received reports that four civilians were seriously wounded after security forces opened fire on demonstrators in West Papua/Irian Jaya on 4 December. These incidents highlight the importance of the new Indonesian Government's efforts to secure peace and reconciliation in their troubled provinces through dialogue—a process we fully support.

We have received a small number of parliamentary letters about the situation in the above provinces.

I discussed the current violence in Indonesia with President Wahid and senior Ministers during my visit to Indonesia last week and underlined our deep concern.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the use by the Indonesian army in Ambon of UK-manufactured Saladin armoured cars against civilians. [106732]

Mr. Battle: Saladin vehicles have not been exported to Indonesia since the 1960s. We have no confirmation of recent press reports that UK-supplied Saladin armoured vehicles have been used against civilians in Ambon.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

National Lottery

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list by constituency the amount spent on lottery tickets and the number of lottery millionaires. [107066]

Kate Hoey: I have placed a table showing the amount spent on National Lottery tickets by constituency for the first five years of the National Lottery in the Libraries of the House.

Figures for the number of Lottery millionaires by constituency are not available.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many applications for National Lottery grants have been made by organisations in the Yeovil constituency over the last five years; how many of these have been accepted; and if he will make a statement. [106743]

Kate Hoey: The table shows the number of applications and awards for each of the National Lottery distributing bodies to organisations in the Yeovil constituency, based on information provided by the National Lottery distributing bodies.

Distributing body	Number of applications received	Number of awards made
Arts Council of England	25	15
Heritage Lottery Fund	15	3
Film Council	0	0
Millennium Commission	[1]—	4
National Lottery Charities Board	163	68
New Opportunities Fund	0	[2]0
Sport England	15	8
UK Sport	0	0

[1] Not known.

[2] The New Opportunities Fund has allocated funding to schools in the Somerset County Council, amounting to £1,552,054, under its programme for ICT (information and communications technology) training for teachers and school librarians. In addition, under its programme for ICT training for public library staff, Somerset County Council will receive the entitlement of £135,725. Funding is allocated by Local Education Authority/Library Authority and it is not possible at present to provide a breakdown by parliamentary constituency.

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish tables for the (a) sales of national lottery tickets in and (b) awards from the lottery to (i) parliamentary constituencies, (ii) counties and (iii) regions ranked in descending order by amount in each case. [106843]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 25 January 2000]: I have placed tables showing National Lottery awards by constituency, county, and region by descending order of amount; and tables showing ticket sales by constituency and by region, by descending order of amount, in the Libraries of the House. Ticket sales by county are not available.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many National Lottery grants, indicating the amounts involved, have been allocated to projects in London via (a) national companies, (b) national institutions and (c) local London community groups. [106808]

Kate Hoey: According to my Department's National Lottery awards database, there have been 5596 grants to organisations based in London since the National Lottery began, with a total value of £2,263,714,761. Of these, 4,650 grants, with a total value of £1,230,738,680, have been classified by the National Lottery distributors as local awards; the remaining 946 awards, with a total value of £1,032,976,081, have been classified as non-local.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the value of lottery funds received by organisations in the Gedling constituency; and if he will make a statement. [106831]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 25 January 2000]: According to my Department's National Lottery awards database (which uses information supplied by the National Lottery distributing bodies) there have been 50 awards to organisations based in the Gedling constituency, totalling £1,295,563.

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list, in each constituency the (a) sales of National Lottery tickets and (b) allocation of Lottery funding ranked in order of (i) number of tickets sold and (ii) value of Lottery funding, in each of the first five years of the Lottery's operation. [106150]

Kate Hoey: I have placed a table showing Lottery awards by constituency, where known, for each year from 1995 (the first year in which awards were made) to 1999 in the Libraries of the House. The table is taken from my Department's National Lottery awards database, using information provided by the National Lottery distributing bodies. It allocates awards to constituencies according to the applicant's post code.

I have also placed a table showing total ticket sales to 13 November 1999 in the Libraries of the House. Annual breakdown of these data is not available.

Deregulation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what orders his Department has made under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 in each year since 1994; and what plans it has to introduce such orders. [106089]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 20 January 2000]: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) has made two orders under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. They are:

The Deregulation (Wireless Telegraphy) Order 1996 (SI 1996/1864)

This abolished the requirement for TV dealers to hold TV licences and to register with the BBC. It was estimated to have saved TV dealers £10,000 a year.

The Contracting Out (Functions in relation to the Management of Crown Lands) Order 1998 (SI 1998/215)

This removes the statutory responsibilities of the Secretary of State for DCMS, for the day to day management of the historic royal palaces which is now carried out under contract by the Historic Royal Palaces Trust.

DCMS will continue to look for opportunities to use such orders to remove unnecessary legislative restrictions.

Subtitling

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action his Department is taking to ensure that broadcasters comply with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in respect of subtitling on their (a) digital television channels and (b) videos. [106138]

Janet Anderson: It is for the broadcasters themselves to ensure that they are acting in accordance with the requirements of the Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which relates to access to goods, facilities and services. Broadcasting, like other services to the public is covered by the Act, while the manufacture and design of manufactured goods, such as videos, are not. Broadcasters are also subject to the "Code on Subtitling, Sign Language and Audio Description on Digital Terrestrial Television", drawn up by the Independent Television Commission (ITC) under Section 20 of the Broadcasting Act 1996. The Code is concerned with the access to digital terrestrial television services for people with hearing disabilities and visual impairments. The code requires digital terrestrial broadcasters to provide subtitles on at least 50 per cent. of their services within 10 years of the commencement of digital services. The Independent Television Commission will continue to monitor the performance of commercial DTT channels to ensure compliance with the code. The ITC are currently looking at the implications of the Disability Discrimination Act to ensure that their codes are consistent with it.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the ITC's returns from each of the (a) digital and (b) analogue terrestrial channels covered by its statutory subtitling targets for each of the last five years. [106974]

Janet Anderson: The first digital terrestrial services began in November 1998 and the Commission has not yet published returns for these services. The ITC has published the following returns for analogue terrestrial channels in its Annual Reports:

Percentage

	ITV	GMTV	Channel 4	Channel 5
1994	30	29	37	—
1995	35	30	36	—
1996	41	37	45	—
1997	51	39	56	23
1998	61	42	60	27

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what plans he has to introduce legislation to set statutory subtitling targets for cable and satellite broadcasters; and if he will make a statement; [106970]

(2) what is his Department's policy on subtitling on (a) cable and (b) satellite television channels. The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting, [106971]

Janet Anderson: The Government have no current plans to legislate on subtitling for cable and satellite broadcasters. They have however, made clear their concern at the apparent poor level of subtitling on cable and satellite channels and have encouraged all broadcasters to respond positively to the RNID's initiative for a voluntary charter on broadcast subtitling.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the statutory subtitling targets set by the ITC for each year from 1995 to 2005 inclusive. [106973]

Janet Anderson: The ITC has set the following targets:

Percentage

	Analogue			Digital Terrestrial Television
	Channel 3	GMTV	Channel 5	Year	From date of start of each programme service
1995	32	29	—	1.	5
1996	38	33	—	2.	10
1997	45	37	23	3.	15
1998	52	41	27	4.	20
1999	56	46	32	5.	25
2000	61	50	37	6.	30
2001	68	54	43	7.	35
2002	75	54	50	8.	40
2003	79	58	—	9.	45
2004	83	58	—	10.	50

The Commission will review the targets for subtitling on Channel 3 and Channel 5 analogue services in 2001 to decide whether any further increase is feasible and has undertaken to review the interim targets set for digital terrestrial services every two years from the start of services.

ITV (Mergers)

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received regarding the proposed mergers within ITV. [106953]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 25 January 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a number of representations from interested parties on the proposed mergers within ITV, which reflect a wide range of views. Details of these cannot be given due to commercial confidentiality.

Channel 5

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of programmes broadcast by Channel 5 in 1999 were of European origin as defined within EU Directive 89/552/EC. [106966]

Janet Anderson: Provisional figures for 1999 indicate Channel 5 continued to meet the requirement in the European Broadcasting Directive 89/552/EC, as amended by Directive 97/36/EC, for the majority of transmission time to be devoted to works of European origin. The initial figures indicate that 53 per cent. of broadcast time on Channel 5, excluding advertisements, sports, news, games and teletext services, was devoted to works of European origin. The final figure will be published later this year by the Independent Television Commission.

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money has been raised from sponsors to replace tobacco sponsorship of sporting events by the Government Task Force on tobacco sponsorship of sport. [106445]

Kate Hoey [pursuant to the reply, 12 July 1999, c. 25W]: It is too soon to be looking to replace existing contracts and our help can most effectively be targeted in the 12 to 18 months before they lapse, which is the normal lead in time for negotiating new sponsorships. However, I am keeping in close touch with the sports involved and Task Force members are also offering ongoing advice and assistance to help the sports prepare to move away from existing tobacco sponsors.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the Task Force on tobacco sponsorship of sport has met since its inception. [106444]

Kate Hoey: There have been three formal meetings of the Tobacco Sponsorship Task Force which were held on: 10 December 1998; 24 February 1999; and 19 October 1999. In addition there have been 11 meetings between officials in my Department, Task Force members, and the individual sports concerned.

SCOTLAND

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) in relation to implementation of section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 (a) who is responsible for the problem, (b) who are the stakeholders and (c) what are the success criteria; and if he will make a statement; [106420]

(2) when he expects police forces in Scotland to comply with the requirement of section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997; what is the reason for the delay in doing so; and if he will make a statement. [106418]

Dr. Reid: The requirements of section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 are met in Scotland by the Scottish Criminal Records Office computer database which records all certificate holders and firearms dealers and is accessible on-line to Scottish police forces.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total Regional Selective Assistance payments in Scotland by local authority area for the latest 12 month period for which figures are available. [104871]

Dr. Reid: The figures for the last fiscal year are given in the table. Since July 1999, the Regional Selective Assistance grant scheme in Scotland has been administered by the Scottish Executive.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105861]

Mr. Wilson: I refer to the reply given by the Minister for Competitiveness on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 519W.

Departmental Productivity

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to increase the productivity and reduce the running costs of his Department. [103854]

Dr. Reid: Delivering efficient and modern public services is a key part of the Government's agenda for improving productivity. Greater efficiency is being sought therefore within the public sector to ensure that the most effective results are obtained from available resources. My Department is still in the process of establishing its full range of activities and is committed to delivering improvements in performance within approved running cost limits.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal (Waltham Forest)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what data he collates regarding the monitoring of training services provided under the New Deal in the London Borough of Waltham Forest. [104102]

Ms Jowell: Responsibility for the monitoring of training services provided under the New Deal for Young People in the London Borough of Waltham Forest rests with the local partnership in the Ilford unit of delivery. The Employment Service has worked with the Training Standards Council—the independent body set up by the Secretary of State to evaluate and report on Government funded work based training—to produce a framework to assess training provision. Part of this process is an annual self assessment that in Ilford's case will take place in February 2000. To inform the inspection process the New Deal Partnership collates details of New Deal participants and information on the achievement of those who have left New Deal options. This information is broken down by gender, ethnicity and disability status. Separate statistics are compiled for each contractor involved in the local delivery of New Deal options.

A-levels

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the percentage of A-level students who received A grades taking (a) modular examinations and (b) taking non-modular examinations in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [106131]

Mr. Wicks: Of the modular GCE A-level entries in England in each of the last three years, the following percentages resulted in A grades:

Modular courses

Year	Percentage
1997	17
1998	18
1999	20

Of the non-modular GCE A-level entries in England in each of the last three years, the following percentages resulted in A grades:

Non-modular courses

Year	Percentage
1997	15
1998	16
1999	16

Of all GCE A-level entries, the split between modular and non-modular is as follows:

Year	Percentage
Modular entries
1997	33
1998	44
1999	39
Non-modular entries
1997	67
1998	56
1999	61

Note:

ie Of all GCE A-level entries in 1999, 61 per cent. were non-modular, and 39 per cent. were modular.

Assisted Places (Worcester)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils are on assisted places for (a) year nine, (b) year 10, (c) year 11, (d) year 12 and (e) year 13, at the (i) King's School, (ii) Alice Ottley, (iii) Royal Grammar School and (iv) St. Mary's Convent in Worcester for the year 1999–2000. [106769]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information requested is given in the following table:

Numbers of assisted place holders in academic year 1999–2000

	(i) The King's School, Worcester	(ii) Alice Ottley School	(iii) Royal Grammar School	(iv) St. Mary's Convent School
(a) Year 9	25	17	38	9
(b) Year 10	20	16	29	8
(c) Year 11	30	23	35	0
(d) Year 12	29	8	33	1
(e) Year 13	28	11	28	0

Local Learning Partnerships

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on (a) the role of local learning partnerships in the work of local learning and skills councils and (b) the timetable for consultation on local learning partnerships. [106796]

Mr. Wicks: There are now over 100 Learning Partnerships throughout the country. They were established following extensive consultation by DfEE with national partners and, through them, with local agencies (colleges, TECs, careers services, LEAs etc.). Learning Partnerships have a key role in the new post-16 arrangements. They will provide the local LSCs with invaluable advice about the learning needs of young people, adults and the community in general, as well as the skill needs of employers. This advice will inform the local LSCs' annual planning of learning and skill needs and priorities for the development of local provision.

The role of Learning Partnerships in relation to the local Learning and Skills Councils has been published in the Learning and Skills Council Prospectus "Learning to Succeed" (December 1999)—paragraph 2.43 to 2.48 and the Secretary of State's letter of 17 January 2000 to all Members enclosing the Learning Partnership Policy Statement. Both documents are available in the Library of the House.

The White Paper "Learning to Succeed" posed specific questions regarding the role of Learning Partnerships and how they might best support local LSCs. Respondents indicated overwhelming support for their role in the new post-16 arrangements and therefore there are no plans for further consultation on Learning Partnerships.

Pupil–Teacher Ratios

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the (a) total number of pupils on school rolls and (b) pupil–teacher ratio in (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools in Northumberland for each year since 1995. [106823]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information requested is shown in the table.

Number of full-time equivalent pupils, pupil–teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools in the Northumberland local education authority area: 1995–99

	Primary schools		Secondary schools
	Full-time equivalent number of pupils	Pupil:teacher ratio [1]	Full-time equivalent number of pupils	Pupil:teacher ratio [1]
1999	20,155	24.1	29,968	19.0
1998	20,271	24.8	30,011	19.2
1997	20,348	24.5	30,052	18.6
1996	20,241	24.6	29,804	18.5
1995	20,160	24.3	29,758	18.4

[1] The pupil–teacher ratio within schools is the ratio of the full-time equivalent number of pupils (counting each part-time pupil as 0.5 where applicable) to the full-time equivalent number of qualified teachers.

Free School Meals (Blyth Valley)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils in Blyth Valley schools who are from families on the (a) income support and (b) family tax credit schemes will be entitled to free school meals. [106822]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information is not available in the form requested.

In schools[1] in the Northumberland local education authority area, there were 7,427 pupils who were known to be eligible for free school meals. This represented 14 per cent. of the total pupil population in these schools.

[1]Includes Maintained Nursery, Primary and Secondary Schools and all Special Schools.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the upper and lower quartile and median SSA per pupil for each year since 1990–91 at 2001 prices for all LEAs in England. [106559]

Ms Estelle Morris: The table lists the information requested for the primary and secondary SSA per full-time equivalent 5 to 15-year-old pupil.

	Lower (1st) quartile	Median	Upper (3rd) quartile
1990–91	1,735	1,801	1,988
1991–92	2,004	2,073	2,302
1992–93	2,124	2,195	2,449
1993–94	2,160	2,259	2,507
1994–95	2,182	2,273	2,519
1995–96	2,138	2,226	2,484
1996–97	2,239	2,305	2,512
1997–98	2,301	2,379	2,527
1998–99	2,416	2,502	2,636
1999–2000	2,537	2,612	2,763
2000–01	2,655	2,739	2,895

Note:

All figures are in pounds per pupil at 2000–01 prices, using the GDP deflators published on 22 December 1999. No adjustments have been made to take account of changes in local authority function.

Special Measures Schools

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many newly qualified teachers were working in schools in special measures in September 1999. [106691]

Ms Estelle Morris: Since 1 September 1999, schools already on special measures cannot employ newly qualified teachers who are going through induction, unless they are certified by Ofsted as suitable for the induction of teachers.

Information on the number of newly qualified teachers in schools on special measures certified as suitable for induction is not available centrally.

Higher Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to introduce value-added measurements in higher education. [106842]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 25 January 2000]: Following the recommendations of the Dearing report, we asked the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) to develop a set of indicators and benchmarks for the higher education sector. The new performance indicators for higher education were published on 3 December 1999. The HEFCE has no current plans to introduce value-added measures as strictly defined.

Sixth-form Curriculum

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding he has made available to local education authorities to support the changes to the sixth-form curriculum coming into force from September 2000; and if he will make a statement. [106832]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 25 January 2000]: The Department estimates that the recurrent costs of successfully implementing the forthcoming reforms to post-16 qualifications in LEA maintained schools are likely to be of the order of £35 million in 2000–01. The sum was added to the Education Standard Spending Assessment for that year, in the light of the Comprehensive Spending Review. It is for individual local education authorities to decide how to allocate resources to the schools they maintain.

Independent Sector

Mr, Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on (a) the size and composition of the independent non-publicly funded sector in (i) further and (ii) higher education, (b) the steps he is taking to ensure that its quality is maintained and (c) his action intended to improve its contribution to the objectives of the White Paper, "Learning to Succeed" (Cm 4392). [106844]

Mr. Wicks: There is no centrally held information on the number of independent non-publicly funded providers or institutions of Further and Higher Education.

Under the Learning and Skills Council's new funding system, independent providers may receive funding, and would therefore be subject to inspection and quality assurance.

Special Educational Needs

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the pilot schemes supported through the Special Educational Needs Standards Fund Grant to develop work on the education of children with emotional, behavioural and psychiatric problems. [106757]

Jacqui Smith: Local education authorities in receipt of grant to support children with emotional and behavioural difficulties (EBD), under the Special Educational Needs Standards Fund for 1999–2000, must produce a progress report by June this year. Similar levels of information will be required on projects beginning in 2001–02. A major consideration in deciding whether to support each project continues to be that adequate mechanisms for monitoring and evaluating the work are built into the design.

We will be writing to LEAs before Easter with details of the type of additional information we will require. I am setting up an EBD Advisory Group, composed of practitioners and other experts in the field, and we will draw on their expertise as to the most useful form this information might take. The information from LEAs will be used to inform decisions on SEN for the longer term. Where they report good practice we will seek to disseminate this widely through published case studies, conferences and through the Department's Special Educational Needs website.

Occasional and Unqualified Teachers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in how many (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) special schools in each LEA inspected by Ofsted during the 1998–99 school year 10 per cent. or more of the staff were treated for the purpose of the inspection as occasional or unqualified teachers. [106689]

Ms Estelle Morris: This is a matter for HM Chief Inspector of Schools. I have asked him to write to the hon. Member and to place a copy of his reply in the Library.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105875]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 118W.

Islington Council

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will place in the Library all documentation relating to the appointment of contractors to administer the central services of Islington Council's Education Department. [106344]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 24 January 2000]: Much of the documentation relating to the contract is commercial in confidence. However, I am placing in the Library the "Invitation to Negotiate" that was issued to selected bidders in August. This includes a draft contract, proposed performance standards and their link to the payment mechanism and a description of the services to be outsourced.

Pupil Funding

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the funding made available in the 1999–2000 standard spending assessment for each (a) primary and (b) secondary pupil in Northumberland. [106983]

Ms Estelle Morris: The 1999–2000 Standard Spending Assessment (SSA) per pupil in Northumberland is as follows:

	£ per pupil
Primary	2,240
Secondary	2,877

Teachers (Performance-Related Pay)

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the proposed salary scale for the assessors to be employed to assess teachers for performance-related payment; how many such assessors he expects will be employed; and what estimate he has made of the total cost of administering the assessment scheme, excluding the cost of the performance-related pay. [107177]

Ms Estelle Morris: Headteachers will be responsible for assessing teachers against national standards to move to the new upper pay spine proposed by the Government. DfEE has contracted Cambridge Education Associates Limited (CEA) to manage the appointment, deployment and quality assurance of external assessors who will verify, through sampling, headteachers' assessments.

The payment of external assessors is a matter for CEA, but it will be made on a pro rata basis dependent upon the number of applicants in each school.

The number of external assessors to be deployed will be dependent upon the number and distribution of teachers who apply to cross the Performance Threshold. This number will not be known until summer 2000. The total cost of administering the scheme will be dependent upon the number of assessments carried out and again this will not be known until later in 2000.

Child Labour

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has for publishing the White Paper on the instrument adopted at the 1987 session of the International Labour Conference concerning the prohibition and immediate action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. [107557]

Ms Jowell: I have today published a White Paper entitled, 'International Labour Conference', copies of which have been placed in the Library.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Jury Trial

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will seek powers to empanel parallel juries to allow the study of the dynamics of juries and how they reach their verdicts. [106723]

Jane Kennedy: There is no intention to seek the powers to empanel parallel juries for research into juries. Any proposals received by the Government for such research are considered individually.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research he has commissioned on the jury system and how juries arrive at their verdicts. [106724]

Jane Kennedy: Such research is currently restricted by section 8 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981. No research has been commissioned by the Lord Chancellor's Department into how juries arrive at their verdicts.

Prisoners (Court Hearings)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will review the principle of holding (a) small claims court and (b) county court hearings in prisons on cases brought by prisoners against the Prison Service and others; and if he will make a statement. [106569]

Jane Kennedy: There are no plans for a review. The judiciary can hold civil or family court hearings in any location, including prisons. The judge, when considering applications to hold hearings outside the court building, will take into account the views of the other side.

Judges

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the percentage of judges who were (a) registered disabled, (b) women, (c) from ethnic minorities and (d) from (i) independent schools, (ii) grammar schools and (iii) other schools in each of the years (i) 1970, (ii) 1979, (iii) 1989 and (iv) 1999. [107013]

Mr. Lock: Serving judges and applicants for judicial appointment are not asked currently to declare whether they have a disability and no such records are held. Applicants for judicial appointment are no longer asked to give details of their secondary education. While such information was collected in the past, it is held on individual personal records and has not been collated. It could therefore be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Even if such information were available it would not be possible to provide a breakdown as requested because the status of a particular school may not be clear or might have changed over time. Historical information about gender and the ethnic origin of the judiciary is not available for all of the years requested.

The table shows the percentages of judges who were women and from ethnic minorities in 1992 (the first full year for which such information is available) and 1999. As the ethnic origin of candidates for judicial office was not sought before October 1991 the data may be incomplete. A second table also provides what limited information there is available about women in the judiciary in 1970, 1979 and 1987. No figures are readily available for 1989.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Staff

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many Hindus are employed by her Department. [106638]

Clare Short: My Department does not collect information on the religious affiliations of its employees.

Kosovo

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the non-Governmental organisations funded by her Department that are present in Kosovo; and what assessment she has made of their co-ordination and effectiveness. [106339]

Clare Short: My Department has provided funding for the following NGO activity in Kosovo:

Pharmaciens sans Frontières
Handicap International
International Medical Corps
Goal
Feed the Children International
Medair
Mercy Corps Europe
Scottish Charities Kosovo Appeal
Global Care
Children's Aid Direct
Help Age International Oxfam
ADRA
International Rescue Committee
War Child.

In making applications for funding, NGOs are required to describe the agency's involvement in sectoral co-ordination arrangements, and their knowledge of other agency activity in the same area. NGO programmes are subject to monitoring by our field office staff and, in the case of larger programmes such as the £5 million International Medical Corps programme of support to primary health care, by London experts.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made in the past three months to the United Nations Mission in Kosovo concerning the humanitarian situation in the Balkans. [106436]

Clare Short: The key humanitarian issues in Kosovo are warmth and shelter. Staff from our Field Office and Infrastructure Engineering Unit in Pristina have worked closely with United Nations Mission in Kosovo's (UNMIK) humanitarian pillar, headed by United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), and other donors over the past three months to implement power transmission and water programmes. These will complement the UNHCR-co-ordinated shelter programme, which has received generous support from the European Union.

Ministerial Meetings

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many meetings of the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy she has attended since May 1997. [106447]

Clare Short: Attendance at Cabinet Committee meetings is not made public in line with Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Departmental Consultations

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by her Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106297]

Clare Short: In 1997, my Department published its White Paper on International Development following an extensive consultation exercise. This committed us, among other things, to more open and collaborative ways of developing policy. In the following year, we launched a Development Policy Forum. A range of development issues were discussed with individuals and representatives of groups from across society in a series of nine regional forums, culminating in a national Forum. A second round of forums is now underway. The aims are to share thinking and ideas on key current development issues and to raise awareness. A copy of the report of the 1998 Forum and details of the 2000 Forum are available on the DFID website (under 'Working With Us').

In 1998, over 500 UK and overseas civil society groups were consulted as part of a major review of the way DFID works with these organisations. Groups were invited to write to the Department to set out their views. The ideas which emerged were drawn together and discussed further during 1999, resulting in new DFID funding mechanisms to strengthen civil society in poor countries, through civil society groups in the UK. These mechanisms provide for ongoing consultation, and willingness to further review and update arrangements on the basis of lessons learned.

We are also providing published strategies for all the countries and institutions with which we work after a period of consultation with appropriate stakeholders.

In 1999, DFID began a major consultative exercise to produce a set of papers on how the international community, together with developing countries and others, can achieve the International Development Targets set out in the White Paper, and what action DFID should itself be taking to contribute to this global effort. Each of these papers will be produced following a consultation exercise with developing country governments, civil society at home and overseas, the private sector, international development agencies, other donors, academics, and others. Draft copies of each paper are being distributed and written comments invited. Seminars to discuss each draft are being arranged. These papers will be made publicly available when finalised. The analysis they contain of the strategies required to achieve the International Development Targets will be used to sharpen the focus of DFID policies and resource allocations. Further, we hope the analysis will be of value to all those involved in international development, the international agencies, the bilateral donors, civil society organisations and those in developing countries themselves.

Aid Criteria

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what criteria she uses when deciding whether to suspend aid payments to Governments in the developing world. [106439]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 28 October 1999, Official Report, column 940W.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with (a) other EU countries and (b) the 41 poorest countries concerning reform of the World Trade Organisation since 1 December 1999. [106430]

Clare Short: (a) Since 1 December I have had no meetings with EU partners regarding WTO reform. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry discussed this issue in the General Affairs Council in Seattle and since then has been in touch with Commissioner Lamy and EU Trade Minister colleagues, outlining UK proposals for WTO reform.

(b) Since the Seattle meeting, I have had no direct discussions with representatives of the 41 Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPCs) on trade-related matters. I will meet representatives from HIPCs and others at the UNCTAD X meeting in Bangkok, 12–19 February, and will discuss a range of trade-related issues.

Russia

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what direct Government assistance has been provided to Russia since 1 December 1999. [106431]

Clare Short: Information is not available on the form requested. My Department is responsible for most British Government assistance to Russia. DFID expects to spend around £28 million on bilateral assistance to Russia in the current financial year. Between 1 December and 20 January, DFID approved a total of £4.4 million for new projects; this includes a contribution of £0.89 million to the UN for humanitarian assistance to those displaced by the conflict in Chechnya. Other Government Departments including the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ministry of Defence and the Department for Trade and Industry have smaller programmes of co-operation with Russia. In addition, we provide significant assistance to Russia through the multilateral agencies, especially the EU Tacis programme.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funds from the know-how fund are allocated to Russia. [106432]

Clare Short: We expect to spend around £28 million on bilateral assistance to Russia in the current financial year.

Literacy

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will estimate the number of people who have acquired literacy as a result of her Department's contributions to education programmes in the last two years. [105387]

Clare Short: It is not possible to give an estimate of the number of people who have acquired literacy as a result of our contribution to education programmes. In Africa and Asia we are currently funding a large number of substantive primary education programmes, all of which will contribute to the eradication of illiteracy. We have committed over £300 million to these programmes since May 1997. Millions of people will benefit from them.

Guyana

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what consultations there have been between her Department and the European Commission concerning the proposed financing of a road from Georgetown to Lethern in Guyana; and what advice her Department has given on the project. [106146]

Clare Short: From our local donor consultative process we understand that consultants were engaged last year by the EC to look at the feasibility of such a road.

The EC received a report in December, and this is now the subject of discussion between the EC and the Government of Guyana.

Congo

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the level of humanitarian aid from HM Government dispatched to the Congo; and what steps she is taking to ensure such aid is not appropriated by the combatants. [106384]

Clare Short: Since the current conflict began in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) in August 1998, the UK has committed £1.7 million in humanitarian assistance to help people affected by the conflict. This includes £0.7 million to assist Congolese refugee populations in Zambia, Tanzania and Uganda.

Humanitarian assistance is provided to meet the needs of affected populations in the most effective way possible. In the DRC, the UK's assistance has been provided through the United Nations and well-established non-governmental organisations. My Department is in regular contact with these and other organisations active in the DRC, and receives written reports to account for all the Department for International Development's humanitarian expenditure. Organisations are expected to identify the beneficiaries of any project supported by the UK to ensure that resources are targeted at the civilian populations in most need.

Great Lakes (HIV)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures are being taken to restrict the spread of HIV in the Great Lakes Region; and if she will make a statement. [106404]

Clare Short: Tackling the HIV/AIDS epidemic must play a central part in helping to reduce poverty, and to work for peace, security and prosperity in Africa. At the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in South Africa in November 1999, the Prime Minister announced a new UK Government commitment of £22.7 million for HIV/AIDS in Africa. This includes £14 million to the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative (IAVI) to help develop a safe and affordable vaccine.

In the Great Lakes region, the current conflicts exacerbate the difficulties of addressing health issues. In the cases of Burundi and the Democratic Republic of Congo, the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeals contain interventions to help tackle the spread of HIV/AIDS.

In Rwanda in particular, the World Bank and DFID are working together to design a support programme for the education sector. Plans under discussion include support for HIV/AIDS awareness.

Trade (Globalisation)

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what role her Department will play in helping developing countries secure a fair share of the benefits of globalisation. [107554]

Clare Short: Globalisation is at a critical stage for developing countries. It is generating massive wealth and has the potential to help lift millions out of abject poverty. But it could also lead to increased inequality, with the risk that some countries remain marginalised and in poverty. My Department is analysing the issues surrounding globalisation and its impact on development, with a view to publishing a second White Paper in the autumn. This would also look at the experience of the three years since our first White Paper and provide the platform for the work of the Department over the next few years.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Allowances (Devolution)

Mr. Amess: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what arrangements are made in respect of the allowances paid to hon. Members who are also members of (a) the Scottish Parliament and (b) the Welsh Assembly. [107268]

Mrs. Beckett: The arrangements for hon. Members who are also Members of the Scottish Parliament or National Assembly for Wales are the same as those for other hon. Members.

Doorkeepers

Mr. Stunell: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how many doorkeepers have been recruited in each year since 1990; and in each year how many have been (a) former military personnel with 22 or more years service and (b) other former military personnel; and how many have been (i) men and (ii) women. [106476]

Mr. Kirkwood: Doorkeepers have been recruited in the following years since 1990:

Year	Number	Over 22 years military service	Under 22 years military service	Male	Female
1993	4	2	1	4	—
1994	3	1	—	1	2
1996	5	2	1	5	—
1998	2	—	1	2	—
Total	14	5	3	12	2

Mr. Stunell: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the current complement of doorkeepers; and what plans there are to vary this. [106477]

Mr. Kirkwood: The current complement of Doorkeepers is:

1 x Principal Doorkeeper

2 x Deputy Principal Doorkeeper

3 x Senior Doorkeeper

27 x Doorkeepers (1 unfilled post).

The House of Commons Commission approved the recommendation of the Board of Management on the report of the Staff Inspector on the Doorkeeper grades on 24 November 1997. Any variations to this complement will arise from follow up reviews by the Staff Inspector.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Fisheries Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is the Government's policy to conclude a review of the Common Fisheries Policy prior to the expiry of the derogation in 2002 of the six and

12 mile limits; and if he will make a statement on the legal status of those waters in the period between expiry and agreement. [106308]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 575W.

Under Article 14(2) of Council Regulation (EC) 3760/92 the council is required to take any necessary decisions on the future of the Common Fisheries policy by 31 December 2002. The question of a legal hiatus does therefore not arise.

GM Seeds

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each application for national seed listing of genetically-modified varieties, indicating (a) the application number, (b) the company name, (c) the approximate date for decision, (d) the release consent number, (e) the date consent was granted and (f) if different from the national list applicants, the applicants' names. [104760]

Ms Quin: The information is set out in the table.

Beef Imports

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what checks are currently carried out on beef products imported from South and North America to establish if they contain hormone growth promoters; and if he will make a statement. [105653]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: Samples from every consignment of beef from the USA must be examined for residues of certain xenobiotic hormones, natural hormones and for stilbenes.

More generally, all meat imported into the EU must originate from approved third countries. Responsibility for approving third countries rests with the European Commission, who must take account of information on matters which include legislation on the use, authorisation, distribution and marketing of substances which might be administered to livestock. Inclusion and retention on the list of approved countries is subject to the submission of acceptable monitoring plans for residues, including hormonal growth promoters, in meat, which provide guarantees at least equivalent to those provided by EU member states.

Holbeck Holdings

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the outcome was of the Intervention Board's most recent inquiries into the financial standing of Holbeck Holdings of Kilmarnock. [105294]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: The Intervention Board's inquiries revealed that there had been no material change to the company's financial status since they had previously successfully operated under the over-30-month scheme.

BSE (Compensation)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with animal feed manufacturers on compensation for farmers for the BSE epidemic; and if he will make a statement. [103152]

Ms Quin: None. For a farmer to claim damages from the supplier of feed, he would have to show that the supplier either knew or ought to have known the feed was contaminated and would therefore cause damage to the farmer by way of introducing BSE into his herd. No general guidance can be given as each case would have to be determined on its own facts and circumstances.

CABINET OFFICE

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by her Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106292]

Marjorie Mowlam: The information requested is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost. We believe that effective consultation is essential to developing policies and services of high quality. We issued guidance to Departments in 1998 on the subject; we are now evaluating the effect the guidance has had, and will publish our findings.

External Consultants

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what has been spent by her Department on external consultants and advisors since May 1997 funded from (i) her Department's programme provision and (ii) her Department's running costs. [99481]

Mr. Stringer: My Department's expenditure on external consultants and advisers since May 1997 from programme provision is £134,921. The expenditure from running costs is £7,026,025.

WALES

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which projects relating to his Department that appeared in the Private Finance Panel's list of 29 November 1995 (a) have been completed, (b) are still pending, (c) have been dropped and (d) are being pursued by means other than a public private partnership. [105880]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the written answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 25 January 2000, Official Report, columns 117–18W.

Welsh Assembly

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of total cost of the new Welsh Assembly building. [106984]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have not made any such estimate. This is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Operations (Cancellation)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many operations in Wales have been (a) cancelled and (b) postponed since 1 December as a result of the influenza outbreak. [106856]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

EU Structural Funding

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will discuss with the First Secretary the granting of Objective 2 status to North East Wales; and if he will make a statement. [106700]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary on a regular basis and we discuss a number of issues including Structural Funds support for Wales. However, the decision approving the UK's Objective 2 map was made by the European Commission last month and covered those Welsh areas in the UK Government's proposals of 8 October.

Armed Robberies (Alyn and Deeside)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent research he has commissioned into the incidence of attempted armed robberies in Alyn and Deeside; and if he will make a statement. [106701]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have not commissioned any such research. Law and order are matters for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Transport

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to meet the First Secretary to discuss the role of Hawarden Airport, Deeside, in the future economic development of North East Wales. [106699]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular meetings with the First Secretary to discuss a wide range of issues including transport and its impact on the future economic development of Wales. This includes the non-devolved subject of airports, a matter reserved to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The First Secretary has not requested a meeting to specifically discuss Hawarden Airport, but transport is an issue considered in the Assembly's economic development plans. The Welsh Regional Air Services study, which concludes this month, will investigate possible enhanced services such as linking North and South Wales, and the link between air services, economic growth and regeneration.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the First Secretary to discuss the impact of the Government's legislative programme on road, rail and air transport, in the constituency of (a) Alyn and Deeside and (b) North East Wales; and if he will make a statement. [106703]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular meetings with the First Secretary to discuss a wide range of issues including transport and its impact in Wales, which will of course bring benefits to Alyn and Deeside and North East Wales generally.

On 30 November I spoke to the whole of the National Assembly for Wales about the Government's legislative programme and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State addressed members' questions in a second plenary session on 8 December. I am keen to ensure that the interests of Wales are fully met during the passage of the Transport Bill, and will maintain dialogue with Cabinet colleagues and the Assembly.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional allocation there has been to standard spending assessments for local authorities in Wales to support their work under the new contaminated land regime; and if he will make a statement. [106148]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Since Transfer of Functions on 1 July 1999, local authority allocations and contaminated land policy have been matters for the National Assembly for Wales.

Departmental Budgets

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the budget for his Department, including the budget for the National Assembly, in the financial years 2000–01 and 2001–02; and what was the outturn spending in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000. [106063]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The total Welsh budget for both my Department and the National Assembly, is £7,912 million for 2000–01, and £8,336 million for 2001–02. These are the current figures, which are liable to change to reflect transfers to and from other Government Departments.

The out-turn spending in 1998–99 was £6,986 million. The actual out-turn spending for 1999–2000 will not be known until after the end of the current financial year, but is planned to be £7,456 million, subject to subsequent revisions.

NHS Funding

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will discuss with the First Secretary proposals for the introduction of social deprivation factors into the funding of the NHS in Wales. [105887]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand that the Assembly is currently considering options for a review of the health allocation formula for Wales and the Assembly Health and Social Services Committee is due to consider this issue shortly. I will of course be glad to discuss the range of proposals, including the inclusion of social deprivation factors, with the First Secretary.

Airbus

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with other Government departments concerning the Airbus A3XX project; and if he will make a statement. [105554]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet my Whitehall and National Assembly for Wales colleagues on a regular basis and we discuss a range of issues. The Airbus A3XX project is clearly a matter of great economic importance to the UK as a whole and to Wales in particular. The final decisions on the applications for financial assistance for the project rest with the DTI (Launch Investment) and the National Assembly for Wales (RSA) and I am in close contact with both on this issue.

Departmental Smoking Policy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to reduce smoking in his Department. [105791]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department consists of fewer than 40 staff. They have agreed between themselves that smoking should only take place in certain rooms. Any member of staff who wishes to give up smoking receives the support and encouragement of his or her colleagues.

Employment Statistics

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) men and (b) women in each of the standard age groups were employed in his Department in (i) 1979 and (ii) 1999. [104024]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information that my hon. Friend has requested is not held for the Welsh Office for 1979, and could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

The number of male and female staff employed by the Welsh Office, in each of the standard age groups, was (at 1 April 1999):

Standard age groups	Men	Women
16–19	17	18
20–24	90	90
25–29	137	133
30–34	140	214
35–39	183	257
40–44	181	194
45–49	165	163
50+	371	228

Following devolution in Wales, the Wales Office was established on 1 July 1999. The staffing position at the end of 1999 was:

Standard age groups	Men	Women
16–19	–	2
20–24	2	3
25–29	1	2
30–34	4	1
35–39	4	2
40–44	1	2
45–49	2	2
50+	5	4

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the items in the National Asset Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 11 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104492]

Mr. Paul Murphy: In the period from 11 February 1999 to 30 June 1999, the Welsh Office did not dispose of any items recorded in the National Asset Register.

Information is not held centrally for such disposals by the agencies and related public bodies of the Welsh Office during that period, and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Since 1 July 1999 the Wales Office has not disposed of any item recorded on the National Asset Register. It does not have agencies or associated public bodies.

HEALTH

Children Act 1989

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Government will next report on the Children Act 1989. [107556]

Mr. Hutton: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and the Lord Chancellor have today published a report on the Children Act 1989, pursuant to their duties under section 83 of the Act. Copies are available in the Library and Vote Office; and are being sent to all local authorities in England and to a wide range of organisations. A copy of this document can also be found at the following website:- www.doh.gov.uk/scg/chactrep.htm

Strokes

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action the Government are taking to prevent strokes. The Under-Secretary of State for Health. [100866]

Yvette Cooper: We are committed to a substantial and wide-ranging programme to prevent stroke within the "Our Healthier Nation" strategy. We have set a target for reducing the death rate from stroke, heart disease and other circulatory diseases by at least 40 per cent. by 2010. To help to meet this challenging target we are implementing a series of measures to tackle the major risk factors for stroke including smoking, physical inactivity, hypertension and poor diet.

On smoking, for example, our tobacco control White Paper, "Smoking Kills", set out our plans for implementing a ban on tobacco advertising, a tobacco education campaign and smoking cessation services. This is worth £100 million over three years. Our plans to tackle physical inactivity under the "Active for Life" strategy include a £1.5 million programme in this year alone to promote active lifestyles. This follows up our £9 million campaign that set the foundations for our physical activity strategy.

Alcohol misuse and high salt diets are two risk factors for high blood pressure, which increase the risk of stroke. In the case of the former, we are developing a strategy to tackle alcohol misuse in England as confirmed in "Our Healthier Nation", and we will publish it early in the New Year. As for the latter, we expect the Food and Drink Federation (FDF) to publish the findings of its survey of salt usage in manufactured foods early in 2000. Once the report is available we propose to explore with the FDF the scope for reducing the levels of salt in processed foods.

We are also promoting effective prevention within the community in collaboration with the Stroke Association under the Health Action Zone Innovation Fund programme. The 'Preventing Strokes and Saving Lives' innovation fund project in Hull and East Riding Health Action Zone is aimed at those prone to transient ischaemic attacks or mini-strokes to limit the risk of further strokes through providing a programme of lifestyle change, guidance and advice. The service will take a multi-disciplinary and patient led approach working at primary care level and involving patients' families.

CJD

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the incidence of new cases of new variant CJD for each of the last five years. [102310]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Number of cases of variant CJD
1999[1]	10
1998	17
1997	10
1996	10
1995	3

[1] This figure is subject to retrospective adjustment as diagnoses are confirmed.

The Department publishes, on a monthly basis, figures for the number of deaths of definite and probable cases of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease of all types in the United Kingdom. The next press release will be issued on 7 February 2000 and copies will be available in the Library.

NHS (Overseas Patients)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the NHS guidelines for the treatment of people from abroad. [102610]

Ms Stuart: The current Regulations covering charges to overseas visitors for National Health Service hospital treatment came into force on 1 April 1989 (Statutory Instrument 1989 No. 306) and were amended in 1991 (SI 1991 No. 438) and 1994 (SI 1994 No. 1535). The Regulations provide for NHS trusts to establish if an individual patient is exempt from charges and, if not, to make and recover charges for hospital treatment from the liable individual.

Nerve Gas

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths of workers at military bases in Great Britain have been linked to exposure to nerve gas. [103933]

Yvette Cooper: This is a matter for the Ministry of Defence since it concerns the health of workers at MOD establishments.

The Department has no information on the health of workers at military establishments. For information concerning health issues at the Nancekuke base in Cornwall, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 11 January 2000, Official Report, columns 125–26W.

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the effects of exposure to nerve gas on those working at military bases in the 1950s and 1960s. [103936]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has not commissioned any research or evaluated data on this issue, which relates to health effects of workers exposed to chemicals at Ministry of Defence establishments.

Cardiac Surgery (Hampshire)

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the waiting times are for major cardiac surgery in each area of Hampshire. [104163]

Mr. Denham: The maximum waiting time for Hampshire cardiac patients is 15 months. The South East

Office of the National Health Service Executive is currently discussing with local trusts measures to reduce the maximum waiting time to 12 months.

National Framework for Heart Disease

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish the National Framework for Heart Disease announced in November 1998. [104626]

Yvette Cooper: We intend to publish the Framework shortly.

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the items in the National Assets Register sold by his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies since 11 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104482]

Yvette Cooper: Information on individual sales of assets disposed of by the Department, its agencies and associated public bodies is not held centrally.

Details of capital receipts are reported by financial year. Providing details of receipts over a period other than a financial year would involve disproportionate cost. The period 11 February 1999 to January 2000 covers two financial years, and for those two years the following information is available:

(a) Total income from the disposal of National Health Service assets for the 1998–99 financial year

£ million

Financial year	Capital receipts—NHS assets
1998–99	500

(b) Current forecast income from the disposal of NHS assets for the 1999–2000 financial year

£ million

Financial year	Capital receipts—NHS assets
1999–2000	337

Drug Addicts

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what support his Department gives to abstinence as distinct from maintenance programmes for drug addicts; and if he will list the targets of these programmes and action taken in pursuit of them. [104870]

Yvette Cooper: The commissioning of services for drug misusers is essentially a matter for local discretion. Health authorities and local authorities will receive an extra £70.5 million over the next three years to commission and develop drug treatment services.

The Government believe that a range of treatments should be available to allow drug misusers to benefit from those most appropriate to their needs and abstinence should be the primary aim of treatment. Guidance on commissioning standards and on clinical management has been issued by the Department which makes clear that maintenance prescribing should not be a treatment of first choice in a patient presenting for the first time, where other options have not initially been tried.

Well-man Clinics

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of National Health Service general practices offered Well-man Clinics to their patients in (a) 1998 and (b) 1999; [104922]

(2) how many Well-man Clinics were held in National Health Service general practices in 1999. [104921]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is not available centrally.

Bowel Cancer

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of the two pilot studies into a bowel cancer screening programme. [105071]

Yvette Cooper: The two sites of the bowel cancer screening pilot have made considerable progress and screening is now expected to start in March. New staff have been appointed, clinical datasets and protocols are nearly complete and IT systems are now operational. Considerable time has also been spent preparing leaflets to give prospective patients the ability to make informed choices about participating in the pilot.

Telecommunications Masts

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the National Radiological Protection Board has recommended as a safe level of radiation from mobile telecommunications masts. [104994]

Yvette Cooper: The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) provides exposure guidelines that cover the spectrum of radiowave emissions including the microwave frequencies transmitted by mobile telephone base stations. The specific levels depend upon the frequencies used by the operator. The latest advice on exposure guidelines in the United Kingdom can be found in the "Documents of the NRPB," Vol. 10, No. 2 (1999), entitled "Advice on the 1998 ICNIRP Guidelines for Limiting Exposure to Time-varying Electric, Magnetic and Electromagnetic Fields (up to 300GHz)." Copies have been placed in the Library.

Measurements made by NRPB have shown radiowave strengths at ground level and in regions normally accessible to the public are very many times below UK exposure guidelines. The guideline levels can only be exceeded within a few metres directly in front and at the height of the antennas. NRPB is at present preparing a report on the base station measurements it has made. This should be published within the next few months.

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next plans to discuss levels of radiation from mobile telephone masts with the National Radiological Protection Board. [104995]

Yvette Cooper: The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) keeps the issue of exposure from mobile telephone masts under continuous review. In response to the guidelines of the International Commission on Non-Ionizing Radiation Protection (ICNIRP) the NRPB published "Advice on the 1998 ICNIRP Guidelines for Limiting Exposure to Time Varying Electric, Magnetic and Electromagnetic Fields (up to 300GHz)" in its series "Documents of the NRPB," Vol. 10, No. 2 (1999). Copies have been placed in the Library.

In April 1999, my right hon. Friend the former Minister for Public Health asked the National Radiological Protection Board to set up an Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones to assess the current scientific evidence. This Group, chaired by Sir William Stewart, FRS FRSE, is due to report in spring 2000. Government will be considering its findings together with the advice of the NRPB.

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review with the National Radiological Protection Board their guidelines on safe levels of radiation from mobile telephone masts taking account of recent changes in the guidelines on such levels in Australia. [104993]

Yvette Cooper: The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) continues to keep under review its guidelines for the UK for restricting exposures to electric and magnetic fields. It does this based on its own review of the scientific information available taking into account advice from its Advisory Group on Non-ionising Radiation, chaired by Sir Richard Doll. It will also take into account any recommendations made by the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, chaired by Sir William Stewart, that is expected to report in spring 2000. That group is considering all available evidence, both national and international.

NRPB last gave formal advice on exposure guidelines in 1999 in the "Documents of NRPB", Vol 10, No 2 entitled "Advice on the 1998 ICNIRP Guidelines for Limiting Exposure to Time-varying Electric, Magnetic and Electromagnetic Fields (up to 300GHz)." Copies have been placed in the Library. This was in response to the revised guidelines issued by the International Commission on Non-Ionizing Radiation Protection (ICNIRP) in 1998.

Influenza

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with health managers in (a) Australia and (b) Sweden concerning the effect of Relenza on the incidence of influenza this winter. [104899]

Yvette Cooper: None. Relenza is currently licensed only for the treatment of influenza, not its prevention.

The National Institute for Clinical Excellence issued clear advice last year on the use of Relenza. This advice is for this year (1999–2000) only and NICE will review the available evidence, wherever it comes from, in a full appraisal this year, in time to offer guidance to the NHS for the 2000–01 flu season. All available evidence will be carefully considered as part of this appraisal.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what supplies of influenza vaccine are held within the North Essex Health Authority by the authority itself, its trusts and by its GPs; and if he will estimate the number of patients this will treat. [105281]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had with health authorities concerning the availability of influenza vaccine and the promotion of its use. [104911]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 17 January 2000]: The aim of the influenza immunisation policy is to protect those at greatest risk of severe or complicated illness before flu viruses begin to circulate in the community. Ideally people who are in the risk groups recommended for vaccine should have been immunised by now. Flu immunisation delivery is through general practice and general practitioners who order the vaccine direct from the manufacturers. Flu immunisation was well-publicised last autumn and local and national campaigns were run to try and improve vaccination rates. The Chief Medical Officer held a press conference and wrote to GPs about flu immunisation. Circulars on winter planning stressed to health authorities the importance of promoting flu immunisation as part of this planning and as part of the winter 1999–2000 campaign the National Health Service Executive sent all health authorities an information pack to encourage local activity.

7.7 million doses of flu vaccine were distributed this season. This is the highest ever and manufacturers have advised that they have over half a million doses available.

Preventive Health Care

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the demand placed on NHS resources by the provision of preventive health measures in (a) Staffordshire Health Authority and (b) the United Kingdom. [105161]

Yvette Cooper: The South Staffordshire Health Authority published "Inequalities in Health" in March 1998 identifying its main health needs. It has a higher percentage than the national average of GPs engaged on health promotion generally, and in the management of diabetes and asthma specifically (nationally: 98 per cent., 96 per cent. and 96 per cent. respectively; South Staffordshire: 99 per cent., 98 per cent. and 99 per cent.). £274,000 was allocated this year to the North Staffordshire Health Action Zone for smoking cessation work.

For 1999–2000 health authorities received an average increase in their allocations of 6.6 per cent.

Across England, health authorities, in partnership with National Health Service trusts, primary care groups, local authorities and local stakeholders, determine how best to use their funds. Health promotion in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales is the responsibility of the devolved administrations.

Cervical Cancer

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 508W, on plans to incorporate the human papilloma test in cervical cancer screening, when he will make a statement on the advice on HPV testing he received from the National Screening Committee following its meeting on 8 December 1999. [105190]

Yvette Cooper: At its meeting on 8 December, the United Kingdom National Screening Committee considered an outline proposal to pilot the use of HPV testing as triage for mild and borderline smears in the National Health Service cervical screening programme. We will make a statement as soon as we have had opportunity to consider all aspects of the National Screening Committee's proposals including service provision, finance and any wider implications.

BCG Vaccinations

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children received BCG vaccinations on the basis of clinical need in (a) England and (b) Brentwood in the last 12 months. [105192]

Yvette Cooper: The information as requested is not available. The latest information available about BCG vaccinations is contained in the Department of Health's Statistical bulletin, "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England: 1998–99", at Tables 8 and 11, copies of which are available in the Library.

Physiotherapists

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he plans to take to improve the recruitment and retention of physiotherapists in the NHS. [105840]

Mr. Denham: The national recruitment, retention and vacancy survey published in September 1999 gave us the latest authoritative data on staff vacancies from 98 per cent. of National Health Service trusts. It shows that only 3.3 per cent. of physiotherapist posts have been vacant for three months or more in England.

We are ensuring that effective recruitment and retention policies are in place to make the best use of trained staff and that training levels are sufficient to get a better match between supply and demand.

We are taking a number of steps which will help to address the issue of recruitment and retention of physiotherapists. These include the publication of the framework for the management of human resources for the whole of the NHS, "Working Together: securing a quality workforce for the NHS", which sets targets for local employers to improve recruitment and retention year on year. We have issued guidance to the service on improving working lives and we will shortly be issuing guidance on Lifelong Learning and Continuing Professional Development.

We are also modernising services and modernising employment practice in the NHS: developing more supportive, flexible and family friendly working practices; extending and improving investment in lifelong learning and professional development; tackling violence and racism in the workplace; involving staff in the way services are delivered and in the changes and developments that affect their working lives.

We have accepted in full the pay increases recommended by the Pay Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine (including physiotherapist) for 2000–01. The Review Body has recommended an across the board increase of 3.4 per cent. for 2000–01 and for the second year running these increases will be paid in full without staging. Taken together with last year's award, this means that physiotherapists will have received real-terms increases of over 5 per cent., the best settlement for over ten years. Some targeted key groups of staff have received substantially larger awards: last year, newly qualified basic grade physiotherapists received pay increases worth 8.4 per cent.; this year, about 4,500 experienced Senior II physiotherapists will receive increases worth between 8.1 per cent. and 8.4 per cent.

NHS Budget

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the total NHS budget in the current financial year is accounted for by (a) administration, (b) the purchase of drugs, (c) remuneration of medically-qualified staff and (d) research into improved techniques and treatments; and what the percentages were in 1970. [105995]

Mr. Denham: This information is not available in the exact format requested for this year, and not at all for 1970.

Of the forecast total gross expenditure on the National Health Service this year of £43 billion, the projected breakdown is 1 per cent. for Department of Health administration, 2 per cent. for Central Health and Miscellaneous Services[1] and the remaining 97 per cent. for Hospital, Community and Family Health Services[2].
